TO LIVE IN CALIFORNIA YOU MUST

BE A TOP-NOTCHER

and to be a top-notcher you must eat the food that makes red blood, good brain and steady nerve. That's the food that contains the "life of the wheat" in a digestible form. It is made of choicest wheat, cooked and malted, rolled into thin flakes and baked. It is the original flaked wheat food and still the leader in popular favor.

To get the full flavor and delicious crispness of "FORCE" it is best to pour it into a pan or earthenware dish and warm in oven before serving; then serve in large dish with cream, piling the flakes in on one side of the dish and pouring the cream or milk in the other side, dipping the flakes as eaten.

The Passing of Mr. Roosevelt

Let us hope that the golden hour for narrow intellects has passed; that the reins of power have fallen into the hands of a man as big of brain as he is of body; that public policy has ceased to fluctuate between the awkwardness of incompetence and the arrogance of bullyism. Believing with Von Holst that "under no form of government is it so dangerous to erect a political idol as in a democratic republic," we are glad that Mr. Roosevelt's term of office has come to the end. This is a sentiment which we cordially share with others. Without fear of hazarding our reputation for accuracy we may assert that this sentiment is prevalent in every nook and corner of this vast country. Mr. Roosevelt approached the end of his career with the knowledge that there would be much rejoicing over his return to private life, and he consoled himself with the reflection, to which he gave articulation, that other Presidents had been execrated by their countrymen. Doubtless Mr. Roosevelt believes that time will prove the merit of his policies and reinstate him in the affections of the people. We cannot conscientiously indulge in vaticination conducive to pleasurable emotions in the illustrious founder of the Ananias Club. In compliment to him we can say nothing more than that it is not improbable that he has faith in himself; in other words that despite evidence to the contrary it is possible that the extraordinary policies which he pursued were what he conceived to be in furtherance of the welfare of his country. That the effect of those policies has been most mischievous we are convinced; so mischievous that we doubt the ability of Mr. Taft to counteract all the evil that has been done. The principle evil in our opinion is of a psychological rather than of a physical nature. Mr. Roosevelt has given impetus to political heresies that have impaired public judgment and public conscience, and that may in time work irreparable injury. Occurrences which contemporaries regard as of little importance are in the long run the most important of all. A single act of legislation has reversed the destinies of a nation. Society was convulsed by civil wars long before Caesar rose to reap the harvest of previous distractions, and those civil wars had their inception in the demagogic acts of Caius Gracchus. A Taft might have counteracted the mischief done by Gracchus, but there rose instead a Saturninus and a Marius to ridicule the Senate and sow the seeds of envy and distrust, till the people through their own folly became paupers and accepted rations out of the public granaries. Impartial history may extol Mr. Roosevelt, but it must picture him as chafing at the Constitution, snarling at judges who would not accept his interpretation of the law, and propagating the notion that everywhere save in the White House corruption was rampant. Mr. Roosevelt must figure in history as the Chief Magistrate of an institutional government who had no zeal for the institutions which he was sworn to protect.

The Epidemic of Blue Laws

All over the country are movements on foot in behalf of such sumptuary measures as belong to the days of witch-burning and slavery of conscience. Blue laws beget the blues, forbid green old age and, neutralizing the color of pleasure, render the heavens gray as grief and make God's golden Sabbath of Monday's ungodly hue of deepest mazarine, which is a shade more cardinal than sin. The way of the eagle in the heir's pocket is find-outable compared with theirs. As the happy earth spins eastward at the close of Saturn's day, a wave of immorality surges monstrous in the wake of midnight. For a space of time the seventh of the week, we motes adhering to the surface of the mad-whirling ellipsoid are carried, willy-nilly, into a belt of black and blue magic that changes innocent actions into misdemeanors or ever the cock crow, and then,—the alloted twenty-four hours having elapsed and the last stroke of 12 having heralded in the moony miscalled Monday,—out again into normal human atmosphere and sinless activity. Theoretically, under the blue laws, two men may alike be working in the same field, and one taken in sin and the other left in innocence, the division of the pasture into west and east demarkating the sheep from the goat. Worst yet! That body of men takes its time from Greenwich; this, from Washington; a third, from God knows where, and are sinners, or not, accordingly. Out comes the policeman's "Ingersol." As he in his, 'tis a trifle slow in its beat, and you are safe, hail fellow, well met, instead of haled and ill. Ten seconds later would have cost you ten dollars, or, at least, the drinks, to say nothing of your reputation as a God-fearing and law-abiding citizen. Bless Ingersol and the policeman's lucky star! Think of it, reader! they may even forbid you to take o' Sundays your favorite daily or read Town Talk as a specific for the blues. In such unheard-of event, should our asses fall into a well, we should straightway pull long faces, fold pious hands over obedient breasts, bow to the inevitable, and praise Him from whom all blessings flow.

Immorality In Its First Stages

There appears to be a unanimity of sentiment in the matter of the influence of the exposure of graft methods on the morals of children. East and west the cry has gone up that boys and girls in school cannot be expected to be honest and truthful when men in business and politics lie and steal. The statement is so obvious as to be platitudinous, but let us step back a few paces and ask how it has come about that the men who occupy positions of trust have such nebulous ideas of honor, and perhaps we shall discover that there has been a confusion of causes and effects. Wherever there is graft or corruption the guilty are men of education. Most of them have been educated in the public schools of the land where patriotic birthdays are celebrated, "memory gems" recited daily, and monkey antics performed before the flag which floats over every institution of learning, but in those institutions boys and young men are trained under a system which suspends all laws in their favor. They are tacitly encouraged to prey upon their schoolmates who happen to enter a year later than themselves, to interfere with their sports, appropriate or destroy their belongings, and make arbitrary rules and regulations which they are empowered to enforce, though, at the same time, those in nominal authority have no such power over the school at large. Offences which should be checked in their incipiency, and punished by drastic treatment later on if persisted in, are by common consent ignored or laughed at. Cheating at games is condemned only if it is so clumsily managed as to be detected, and cheating at lessons or examinations is condoned for the sake of the "team." Dishonesty of all kinds is winked at because "the honor of the school" demands that outsiders shall be kept in ignorance of what goes on therein, and the very natural consequence of all this is that the pupils who have gone through high school and college in an artificial, tainted atmosphere come out to face the world as ignorant of the rules which ought to govern their conduct as a reservation Indian is of the conventions of high society. When these boys, who have cheated and lied and grafted their way through their scholastic lives find themselves in positions of trust they simply continue the same course which they have always pursued. If they see anything that they want they reach out for it. There is no reason apparent to their minds why they should not unless because some one else, cleverer and quicker, has been before them. The most dangerous criminals we have today are not the thugs and burglars who take their lives in their hands when they undertake to "do a job," but the college trained embezzlers, promoters of fraudulent schemes, bogus check passers and bank looters. The old fashioned bank burglar who broke into safes and strong rooms has virtually disappeared but in his place is the charming son of good society who manipulates the books and speculates with the funds, and whose female relatives can be depended upon to make an attractive court room tableau to influence the jury when he is put on trial. The yellow exploitation of graft methods cannot but be bad for young America, but one of the reasons why we have these things to exploit is because for a full generation past we have been deliberately, if not altogether consciously, educating a large part of the growing youth in the belief that they were above the laws which common folk must obey. Another reason, and perhaps the chief reason, is that we have lost sight of the fact that culture is not alone sufficient to produce excellence of character; that the heart must be trained as well as the intellectual faculty. "We shall never learn to feel and respect our real calling and destiny," said Sir Walter Scott, "unless we have taught ourselves to consider everything as moonshine compared with the education of the heart." In other words it is absurd to suppose that by becoming wiser we become better, or that knowledge is of any value that does not exalt the moral dignity of our nature. "The end of learning," said Milton, "is to repair the ruins of our first parents by regaining to know God aright." Such sentiments as these of Scott and Milton are regarded as old-fashioned and therefore of no importance by the half-baked scholars who are today engaged in training the youth of the land. These pedagogues afford exemplification of the aphorism, "A little learning is a dangerous thing." They are applying their little learning to the education and training of future citizens and a sorry mess of it they are making.

The Spread of Irreligion

"Jails close when education reigns" says the Examiner, apropos the dedication of a new school house. Yea, verily, they do! It is barely a fortnight since the Berkeley board of education unearthed a secret society of high school boys banded together for the sole purpose of committing thefts. Last week a college graduate was sentenced to the penitentiary for wire-tapping and other crimes growing out of it. There is not a State in the Union today which cannot muster its educated representative of dishonest banking; and the array of forgers, note raisers and false check passers have, every one of them, enjoyed more than an average share of schooling. Most of them have been taught in our public schools the transcendant importance of success, which means nothing more than the accumulation of wealth. "Get on; get honor; get honest," is the golden rule, and all the while, with the whole land dotted with school-houses, colleges and universities the ideals of life and the standard of life are sinking from day to day. There is a religious reaction in England such as was generated there by the French revolution, but in this country our so-called educated men are treating religion as though it were agreed among men of discernment that it is of benefit only as a comfort to the feeble minded. The acceptance of religion is regarded as a matter in no way amenable to views of reason, something that is not to be discussed by rational beings upon rational considerations. Is it not barely possible that the failure of education from the moral standpoint is in a measure due to the spread of irreligion for which our half-educated men are responsible? No religious creed may be taught in the schools of our country, but all religion can be treated with respect, and, at least, there need be no dogmatic affirmation of the irreconcilability of science and religion. This is the favorite affirmation of the half-educated.

Niagara and Yosemite

Recently enough to be within the memory of the youngest inhabitant old enough to vote a great hullabaloo was raised throughout the length and breadth of this land, the cause of which was the gradual extinction of one of the scenic wonders of this continent. The waters of Niagara were being diverted to the purposes of commerce, and one of the sublimest of the spectacles with which nature delights the eye of man was being robbed of its majesty by the brutal and prehensile hand of industry. The esthetic sense of the people was shocked. A tremendous wave of indignation swept over the country. A halt was called. There is to be no further depletion of the waters of Niagara. Now from the standpoint of estheticism, judged as forms and actions of nature according to the degree of enchantment which they hold, Niagara is as inferior to the Yosemite as a mountain lake to the boundless ocean. Why, then, should we be intolerant of a sentimental protest against a commercial project which cannot be carried out without impairing the beauty of the glorious valley? Why should there be universal solicitude for Niagara and scarcely any for Yosemite? Not absolutely conclusive is the answer that Niagara is the better known spectacle, that for every person who has experienced the divine delight that is inspired by the perennial festival of nature held in the solitudes of the Sierras, ten thousand have been awed by the thunders of the mighty falls of Niagara. That answer will not suffice. In a measure public apathy with respect to the threatened desecration of Yosemite is to be accounted for on the theory of the inability of the average man to appreciate the superior charms of the valley. Take Mr. Theodore Roosevelt as an example of the average man. He is a lover of Niagara but he regards lovers of Yosemite as nature cranks. It is historical that when Mr. Roosevelt visited Yosemite he first beheld its beauties from Glacier Point and was so little impressed that he had no desire to descend. Like the average tourist without a soul but full of curiosity and the pride of conquest Mr. Roosevelt gratified the vulgar passion that possessed him when he realized that he was able truthfully to say, "I have seen the Yosemite." It was with great reluctance that the rough rider, the cold-blooded slayer of the majestic denizens of the trackless woods, yielded to the pleadings of the Rev. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, who was acting as the emissary of the reception committee in the valley below. Mr. Roosevelt condescended to put himself on exhibition but not in a mood that harmonized with his environment. He rode down the mountain paths, past Nevada and Vernal falls, along the banks of the swift flowing Merced, through a diversified landscape that glittered as for the frolic of the nymphs. Did that enchanting scene minister to his delight? Did the spiritual element of it induce him for a moment to abdicate his own petty kingdom? Did he forget self in contemplation of the gorgeous handiwork of his creator? It is of record that as he rode along the floor of the valley a small boy, a native of those mountain wilds, addressed him in the irreverent manner of precocious youngsters. "Hello Teddy!" said the youngster at the top of his voice. And the Chief Magistrate of his country halted and there and then frowned upon the effervescing animal spirits beneath him, and chided the little fellow for his impoliteness. Obviously the works of God which are on exhibition in the Yosemite, and which, perhaps, inspire the rude natives with reverence for God alone, failed to impress Mr. Roosevelt with the littleness of man. Is it conceivable that a man in the heart of the Yosemite can be conscious of the deference due his own dignity and at the same time be sensible of the sublimities that everywhere about him proclaim the majesty of his maker? A prosaic mind is Mr. Roosevelt's, and he is an average man to whom life has no meanings that cannot be deciphered by the common herd. Niagara has impressed him as it has impressed such average men as the Hon. James D. Phelan and the Hon. Marsdon Manson who argue that nature lovers should find as much delight in a big artificial lake as in a picturesque mountain gorge fashioned by the Architect of the Universe. Niagara appeals to these prosaic minds because of its immensity. They view it in the same spirit in which they view a Dreadnought. The very bigness of it is what stirs the emotions of men who are entirely devoid of the esthetic sense. Yosemite Falls in the repose and grandeur of its setting, in its every varying aspects and the grace of its shimmering draperies, is infinitely more beautiful than Niagara but of this Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Phelan and Mr. Manson are unaware. These are men that have never felt the witchery of the soft blue sky, that know not why they admire a gorgeous sunset. To them a primrose by a river's bank is just a little yellow primrose.

Bricks From Babylon

"There is nothing new under the sun." This, like all sayings epigrammatically expressed, goes more or less beyond the strict truth, but it is not so extravagant a dictum as the average philosopher imagines. In our conceit and ignorance we are pleased to view as new many things that are really very old; and the notion is prevalent that as in the dawn of history the great mass of the people were unable to read and write they were scarcely elevated above the brutes. The supposition is widespread that man's great birthright has been held in abeyance until the twentieth century. This supposition is much farther from the truth than the aphorism which affirms that beneath the sun there is nothing new. It is refuted by history written before the dawn of Christianity, and history that is now being written justifies speculation as to whether the sum of human knowledge in this year of our Lord is not less than it was when to Chaldean shepherds the silent skies communicated the secrets that constitute the rudiments of astronomy. The more we learn from the past through the investigations and discoveries of archaeologists, the more we become inclined to the view that book learning is the least part of education, that nature is the mightiest and the kindliest of teachers and that life has its universal lessons far beyond human lore. The most important of recent contributions to history has been made by Professor Delitzsh, the noted Assyriologist of Berlin. From Babylon he has brought to Germany an enormous quantity of bricks and clay tablets bearing inscriptions, which, having been translated, reveal some absorbingly interesting facts. Some of the tablets date back more than 4,000 years. From these tablets we learn that one thousand years before Moses was born the tariff question was a political issue in Babylon and free traders and protectionists were engaged in political strife. In those days the Babylonians had a stock market. There is a record of a banking house that was a contemporary of Abraham and that charged twenty per cent interest on loans. Women were permitted to exercise the privilege of citizenship in Babylon, and there is no record of any quarrel over woman's suffrage. Though there was no compulsory education in those days the people had a multiplication table and they knew how to extract the square root and the cube root. There were no old maids in Babylon. Husbands were found for all women. In breaches of the marriage vow both husband and wife were punished with death. Agriculture was the chief industry of the Babylonians, and all their field work, their irrigation, the rotation of crops, and their harvesting methods were regulated by rigid laws. There may be something new under the sun, but the use of what is new is of less value to us than the knowledge of what is old. There is probably to be found in the bricks from Babylon much of the philosophy that teaches by example, and perhaps many a precept available in practice. There is nothing like history to take the conceit out of us, for it makes it clear to us that our mental powers are no greater than those of the Pyramid builders; that we have done nothing through the centuries but accumulate knowledge, and that it is folly to assume, when considering the value of experience as a guide, that we have any inherent advantages over the founders of ancient civilizations. There is no study which exercises so great an influence as history in correcting the errors of conduct and the prejudices of the mind. It is the school of the virtues and of wisdom, abounding in the revelations of experience. The man that is fortified with a knowledge of history is never the prey of charlatanical reformers.

Song of the King's Jester

I am the fool of Pampelune,
You've seen me oftentimes,
With flute in hand, astride the moon,
Troll out my lilting rhymes.

My soul's enamored of a star
With flaming locks of gold;
The glory she unveils afar
My eyes alone behold.

So, perched upon your silver horn,
Old moon, to see thee more,
I pipe and shrill in careless scorn
Of all the winds that roar.

And O the thrills, the thrills, the thrills,
My wild flute flings on high!
And O the thrills, the thrills, the thrills—
By which all jesters die!

Sleuthing For Pearls

Some Subtle Suggestions for the More or Less Astute Detectives Now Engaged in the Attempt to Solve the Mystery of the Disappearance of the Crocker Necklace Supposed to Have Been Stolen at the Mardi Gras Masquerade Ball.

By Democritus

What "social highwayman" stole Miss Jennie Crocker's pearls?

I agree with the cub reporters that it must have been either a "social highwayman" or a "Raffles." My own reading of Hornung, the discoverer of this peculiar breed of criminals, convinces me that the servants in the house are beyond suspicion; and I agree with Sherlock Holmes that we must "look for the higher-up."

Now there were various kinds of persons who had access to Miss Crocker while she was wearing the pearls. These persons may be divided into two sorts—men and women. We are therefore forced to the conclusion that the pearls were stolen by a man or a woman. Our general knowledge of human nature induces the deduction that if they were stolen by a man the pearls will eventually find their way into the marts of trade through the medium of what is called a "fence" or receiver of stolen goods; and that if they were stolen by a woman they will remain in possession of the thief. The theory of this deduction is to the effect that men thieves steal for revenue only while women thieves "moving" in Miss Crocker's social environment, steal to assuage the cravings of their envy or to appease the longings of their vanity.

If a man stole the pearls they will be either held for ransom or disposed of to the "fence" aforesaid; if a woman stole them they will be placed in a casket to be gazed upon behind the closed doors of the boudoir or worn before the pier glass in the secrecy of the thief's innermost chamber.

No doubt Miss Crocker has already furnished the detectives with the names of all those persons with whom she came in contact on the night that the pearls were "missed." There is a process familiar to detectives called "elimination." It is the first move in any "case" involving a multitude of factors. The experienced detective does not begin by asking "Who stole the pearls?" but "Who did not steal the pearls?" It is logical to infer that any of those who had an opportunity to steal the pearls might have stolen them; but the first inquiry goes to the question, "Who would be least likely to steal them?" Having thus "eliminated" those above suspicion the search concentrates itself upon those who are not wholly absolved from suspicion.

It is incumbent upon Miss Crocker to assist the detectives by remembering the persons who were with her between the time that she knew the pearls were on her person and the time that she discovered their loss. With whom did she "dance, flirt or talk?" How close were these persons during that time? Was it possible for any of these to cut the cord or wire upon which the pearls were strung? It will not be necessary for Miss Crocker to tell the detectives whether it was possible or impossible for any person to remove the pearls without her knowledge—the fact that they were removed is so obvious that any protest by Miss Crocker that "nobody could have taken them off without my knowing it," would be entirely superfluous. Unless she is sure that at no time did she take them off herself, the jewels must have been taken off my somebody else.

My own deduction is along two hypotheses: The pearls were removed by some man with whom Miss Crocker danced, or they were removed by some woman who assisted Miss Crocker to put on her frocks. The first deduction is somewhat complicated by a contradiction: The ballroom was crowded and a man dancer would experience difficulty in getting away with the swag under the casual observation of so many eyes; but on the other hand opportunities might occur in the crush to accomplish the feat without attracting attention. I have not seen Sherlock lately, so I don't know which of these possibilities appeals most probably to that acute mind. As one of the consulting detectives, however, I would advise my colleagues of the Pinkerton force to cross-examine Miss Crocker very closely as to her dancing partners and her recollection of the minutest incidents of the maddest whirl of waltz and gavotte.

As to the women who assisted Miss Crocker to attire herself while wearing the pearls, I think I would include all—that is to say, I would not exclude any maids who were called to assist in the rite of disrobing and enrobing. It will be necessary to first "eliminate" these maids by showing that they are not acquainted with crooks of the anti-"social highwayman" class; with professional burglars, porch-climbers, sneak-thieves and bank robbers or bank wreckers. A mere maid, unattached, or simply pledged to a "steady" wearing a union button or carrying a union card, may be "eliminated" with comparative safety. But if it shall be found that any of the "young men" with whom the said consorts in her off hours, is a tenderloiner, a prize-fight patron, a citizen without visible means of support, or a race-track habitue, it will be worth the while of the detectives to "keep an eye" on the movements of the suspect.

Then we come to the women of Miss Crocker's "set" who were at the frockchanging mystery. Who were they? Have any of them ever been suspected of kleptomania? Are any of them passionately fond of jewels? Have any of them expressed superlative admiration of Miss Crocker's pearls or other jewel gear? and, if so, does Miss Crocker recall that the eyes of any of these women sparkled with a covetous glint? that their expressions of admiration were uttered in a quavering, "Oh-how-I'd-like-to-own-'em" tone? These apparently trivial details are absolutely necessary for the information of the detectives; they are subtle clues by which the deductive detective follows the trail of his criminal. Mr. Sherlock Holmes invariably asks questions of this sort while his acute mind is formulating a theory of the crime in hand. So acute is the mind of Mr. Holmes that after he has obtained answers to these questions he is enabled to put the finger of the police on the criminal without leaving his easy chair in Baker stret—only removing his pipe or cigarette from his thin, immobile lips to tell the stupid Scotland Yarder where to find the thief or murderer or high official in the service of the State Department of the foreign government that has applied to him for assistance in unraveling an otherwise inscrutable diplomatic mystery.

Unless it shall be a consensus of police opinion that the Crocker pearls were stolen by a woman, I should advise that the detectives of Shanghai, Bombay, Singapore, and London be immediately informed of the theft, with a description of the pearls furnished by the jeweler who sold them to Miss Crocker or to the person from whom she received them.

I have already stated my reasons for believing that if the pearls were stolen by a woman they will be kept intact. These reasons will not apply to a man thief. And I advise the foreign search because a man thief would not dispose of the pearls so close to the place where they were stolen. I am surprised that none of

In the Shadow of the Gallows

How a Catholic Priest Saved the Life of a Man Who Was Convicted of Murder on Perjured Testimony Procured by an Over-Zealous District Attorney.

Ponder the case of Herman Billik who was convicted in Chicago of a series of atrocious murders, who was six times reprieved, twice within four days of the date set for his execution, and whose sentence was recently commuted by the Board of Pardons because of a widespread belief that the prisoner was convicted unjustly. This case is of thrilling interest to the disinterested. It holds peculiar interest for the people of this State at this time for the reason that the Legislature has been urged to make conviction easier of achievement, the theory being that there is no danger of the conviction of an innocent man. The Billik case shows that over-zealous prosecuting attorneys and police officials who are more concerned for their own record than for justice and who will procure testimony suitable to their theories are to be found in real life as well as in melodrama. And there is another reason why the case is of peculiar interest to us. This reason may be found in the record of the impanelment of the present grand jury. That record shows that our zealous District Attorney took the pains to exclude men who were not inclined to endorse his official conduct.

A great change of sentiment with respect to Billik has taken place in Chicago. It was brought about by the recantation of the principal witness for the prosecution, who declared that he had perjured himself at the trial. He explained that he had been coerced by the police and the District Attorney's office, certain representatives of which were so eager to make a record in the case that they thought nothing of the life of the prisoner.

Herman Billik was an itinerant fortune-teller who confessed that he made his living off the superstition and credulity of the Bohemian residents of the western part of the city. He was accused of causing the death of six members of a family of the name of Vrzal in one of the most spectacular series of poisonings in the criminal history of Chicago. Emma Vrzal Niemann caused Billik's arrest on December 4, 1906. She denounced him from the bedside of her dying mother, who had committed suicide, and two hours later Billik was put in jail. The woman declared that he had persuaded her mother to take her own life, and had caused the death of her sisters and brother. She accused her dead mother of being the accomplice of Billik, and said that the two had committed the crimes for the insurance of the victims. Billik admitted giving Mrs. Vrzal "love potions," such as he had sold to many of his neighbors, but denied that there was anything harmful in them. At the trial Emma Niemann testified with great vehemence against the accused. It was declared that she had been in love with the man herself, but that he had rebuffed her and otherwise gained her ill-will. Testimony was then introduced with the intention of showing that she had a bad character. The champions of Billik have long been working on the theory that she is the real murderess, but nothing would have resulted from their investigations had it not been for the assistance of the Rev. Father Peter J. O'Callaghan, head of the Paulist Fathers of Chicago, the most dramatic figure in the whole case.

One morning after the celebration of mass Father Callaghan stood before his congregation and said that he had a most unusual announcement to make to them. After a silence so long that it almost struck a chill to the waiting worshippers, the priest announced that he had lately become convinced of the innocence of Herman Billik, who was then awaiting in the Cook County jail the day of execution. A wave of surprise ran over the people. With the exception of Billik's own family, there was probably not a person in all Chicago who did not believe him guilty. The newspapers and public sentiment had demanded his conviction. The case had been fought in the courts for weeks, the jury had found him guilty and, without hesitation, the Judge had set the date.

Father O'Callaghan said that he was not at liberty to tell from what source he had gathered the reasons for his belief. But, looking his people in the face he declared that he intended to take up the fight for Billik's freedom. As the people filed out they whispered to one another, "The confessional!" But, as the most influential communicants swarmed about the priest to question him, and when the reporters bombarded his door with searching inquiries, he only replied: "I cannot tell you. I can only say I KNOW Herman Billik is innocent." So, with the whispered confession from the trembling lips of a penitent, began an unparalleled fight for the life of Billik. It lasted almost two years, and is not ended now by the recent commutation of Billik's sentence to life imprisonment. It is a reminder of those days in the frontier country when the priest was also the teacher, doctor, lawyer and judge of the community.

For, armed only with the crucifix, the priest fought for Billix's life in the courts, on the streets, at mass-meetings on the corners, at benefits in the theatres. He used his own funds, and he begged from his friends. He argued and pleaded and threatened, and finally went out to search for evidence.

For some time after his initial statement Father O'Callaghan was able to do little more than declare his belief in Billik's innocence. He was criticised by his parishioners, sneered at by his enemies and ridiculed in the newspapers. The State's Attorney challenged him to offer evidence to support his declarations. As the day for Billik's execution drew near the priest became desperate, and finally Jerry Vrzal, the principal witness for the prosecution came forward and confessed that he had perjured himself. It is believed that he is the penitent who first told Father O'Callaghan the truth of the case. Since his confession several of the jurors who convicted Billik have confessed that their verdict was rendered on the strength of Jerry Vrzal's testimony.

When the finger of suspicion first began to point toward Emma Niemann, it was recalled that her father-in-law, Henry Niemann, died suddenly, and in a most suspicious manner. Father O'Callaghan suggested that the District Attorney should investigate the matter, but that functionary, reluctant to gather evidence that might convict him of being over-zealous, made an investigation that proved farcical. Then Father O'Callaghan took hold of the matter. The Coroner exhumed the body and found therein large quantities of arsenic. It is now admitted that the theory of the state under which Billik was convicted is utterly inconsistent with any conceivable theory connecting him with the murder of Niemann. Father O'Callaghan is still after the guilty.

The Girl of Sixteen

(From the Hungarian of Maurus Jokai)

It was during one of the uprisings in Bosnia that I was quartered with twelve of my Hussars at the house of a prosperous merchant. He was away from the city on business, but the enforced hospitality of his home was very agreeable under the direction as it was of his charming wife, who spoke a little German. She gave me a nice room, promised me a nice supper and apologized for the absence of her husband. Naught did I care for her husband. She put me in good humor and that was enough.

On the first evening of my official visit the mistress of the house came to my room in great distress. My Hussars were making merry down stairs, and she seemed to be very much alarmed. She fell on her knees and begged me for protection.

"Protection for what?" I asked.

"I entreat you by all the saints, mighty general," the young woman began, "be merciful to a poor, desperate woman, or I shall drown myself."

"I am not a general, but I am at your service. I will do anything for you that is consistent with my honor as a soldier."

"Yes, yes, I was just going to appeal to your honor as a soldier," the woman went on. "You are a noble-hearted, chivalrous man, who can understand a mother's despair. I have a beautiful daughter, and so I was afraid that your Hussars—"

"Well, I can give you my word of honor, madam, that your daughter will meet with no injury."

"But I am horribly afraid, for the child is so beautiful! And I cannot be always with her to protect her. I may be attacked at night. But I could sleep quietly, colonel, if you would allow me to bring my daughter to your room at night, so long as you stay here."

"At night? To my room?"

"Yes; because this is the only place where she would be perfectly safe. Here, under your protection, I know that no harm would befall her. Your promise would protect my child."

"How old is your daughter?"

"Just sixteen, but a perfect angel."

The deuce! So I was now every night to guard a sixteen-year-old angel, whom I had promised on my word of honor to defend. This was a queer situation! I was ready to promote the pacification of Bosnia in every possible way except this.

"You will permit me, at midnight, when everybody is asleep, to bring my sweet little daughter to your room? I thank you! May Heaven bless you!"

But I would gladly have dispensed with such a blessing. I had given my word of honor to protect the girl, and that I might be sure to keep it, she was to be brought to my room at night. And I was to guard, with drawn sword, every night a beautiful girl, as the Sultan's bride is guarded at the feast of Beiram. Oho, we did not bargain for that! I am no anchorite. Besides, it was easy for St. Anthony, for he knew that the beautiful girl who visited him was Satan himself. He ought to have been in my place, where a mother herself brings her daughter and says she is an angel. But my pledged word! A soldier's honor! This woman sees in me some legendary hero, a Lohengrin, who comes in his boat drawn by swans to protect innocence. Dare I destroy her faith? Dare I break my promise? No! I will be iron! I will forbid my eyes to look at her. I will think of nothing but sorrowful things. I'll take the army regulations and read them through. I'll play solitaire. For aught I care, she may be as beautiful as Semiramis herself. I will be stone. But early tomorrow morning I'll try to be sent on guard duty at night. I'm very fond of it when the rain drenches me to the skin. Stay! There's another idea! What if the whole thing is simply a plot? What if I am to be killed like Holofernes? That's it! If I don't want to wake up tomorrow morning without any head, I must be on the watch!

But all my philosophical reflections were overthrown by the sound of light footsteps approaching my door toward midnight. Some one knocked timidly.

"Come in!"

The door opened cautiously, and, smiling pleasantly, the mistress of the house entered with her daughter in her arms. A pretty little creature in swaddling clothes.

"Here she is, colonel! Isn't she as beautiful as an angel?"

"Why—What—You told me she was sixteen!"

"Yes, in her sixteenth month. But she has been weaned, and she won't disturb you. I put a little poppy juice into her milk, so that she will sleep quietly, colonel."

"But—great guns! What harm did you think my Hussars would do the little thing?"

"I—I—" stammered the woman; "I was afraid—they might—eat—my darling—"

I felt as if a torrent of cold water had drenched me. So these people believed we ate little children! I hope I shall never experience another such adventure.

Yellow Journalism In The Making

Or Seeing the Wheels Go Round in One of the Palladiums of Our Liberty.

Scene—The office of the managing editor of the Evening Blackguard. It is at the hour of noon. The city editor has presented himself for the daily conference at which he communicates to his chief the news of the day that has been brought in by the reporters who are in an adjoining room, stationed at their typewriters, waiting for instructions.

Managing Editor. Didn't Heney say anything about hired assassins?

City Editor. Oh, yes, he got off the same old stuff again.

Managing Editor. Well, play it up. Put it in the headlines. Anybody excused for bias?

City Editor. Yes, nearly every man that was examined was of the opinion that Calhoun was held up, and that he was being prosecuted to gratify private revenge. Only one man expressed prejudice against Calhoun.

Managing Editor. Well play him up big and roast the others. How about the story that Calhoun robbed his sister?

City Editor. There doesn't appear to be much in that story. As far as I can ascertain Calhoun was a very generous brother.

Managing Editor. That isn't what I asked you to ascertain. You tell Billkins to play up the Court record and make it appear in the headlines that Calhoun is a scoundrel. We must get that stuff before the jury. Calhoun is getting too damned popular.

Exit the City Editor.

Enter the Telegraph Editor.

Telegraph Editor. All quiet up at Sacramento.

Managing Editor. Well, you get busy and write up the race track bill. I see that it's reported that the bill is unconstitutional. Make it appear that the gamblers are boasting that the Supreme Court has agreed to knock out the bill. You must never lose an opportunity to smash that court. You can say that it's reported that the judges have already expressed themselves. I intend to keep after those fellows until I've got them scared. Perhaps in a few days we'll have Judge Dunne interviewed on the subject. I'll think up what I want him to say.

Telegraph Editor. Anything more, sir?

Managing Editor. No. Don't forget to date that at Sacramento. Make it a special despatch to the Blackguard. And by the way fake up another despatch from Washington roasting Julius Kahn on the Japanese question. I intend to drive that man from politics, just to show him that he can't knock the Blackguard with impunity.

Managing Editor. I see that the Senate has postponed action on Hetch-Hetchy.

Editorial Writer. Yes sir.

Managing Editor. Give the Senate hell. Tell the people that it is now clear that they cannot get their rights until they elect Senators by direct vote, and suggest that we must have aggressive civic patriots in the Senate—men like Phelan—eh—no—don't say that—Spreckels might kick—just civic patriots.

The telephone bell rings.

Managing Editor. Hello! hell—hell—yes; oh is that you judgie? What? No new jurors? So I heard. Yes it is pretty slow work, but—well—you understand. What's that?—tonight? All right judgie, I'll be there."

The President and His Office

With an ardent love for his country and a profound reverence for the law Mr. Taft has entered upon the duties of his high office. His troubles have begun. His responsibilities are upon him. He is deserving of the sympathy of his countrymen. In all probability at the end of a few months he will show a little wear, a little loss of amiability; perhaps he may not succeed in pleasing everybody, but let us be prepared to judge him not harshly. Greater than the worries and anxieties of a King are those of the President of the United States. To apprehend the burdens of that office read Benjamin Harrison's "This Country of Ours." Speaking of the White House, Mr. Harrison says: "It is an office and a home combined—an evil combination. There is no break in the day—no change of atmosphere. The blacksmith, when the allotted hours of work are over, banks his fire, lays aside his leather apron, washes his grimy hands and goes home. And he gets a taste of unsmoked morning air before he resumes his work. There is only a door—one that is never locked—between the President's office and what are not very accurately called his private apartments." According to Harrison "it is a rare piece of good fortune during the early months of an administration if the President gets one wholly uninterrupted hour at his desk. His time is so broken unto bits that he is often driven to late night work, or to set up a desk in his bedroom when preparing a message or other paper requiring unbroken attention." Even hand-shaking Harrison tells us is one of the severest ordeals of the office. The only way for a President to avoid a lame arm and a swollen hand, says Harrison, is to adopt President Hayes's method—"take the hand extended to you and grip it before your hand is gripped." Which reminds me that when a friend spoke to Mr. Lincoln of the wear and weariness of handshaking he said that the tug at the hand was much easier to bear than that at his heartstrings when asked for favors beyond his power to grant.

Statesman Out of a Job

The terms of thirty-one Senators expired with that of President Roosevelt. The most widely known of them is "Tom" Platt, who has been famous since the "Mee too" days when he and Roscoe Conkling resigned because President Garfield would not recognize their candidate for Collector of Customs at New York. Almost equally well known is Senator Foraker, who is going back to his home in Cincinnati to practice law. It is doubtful whether he will ever again appear as a power in politics. Among the other distinguished citizens who have been called back to private life is Secretary Cortelyou, who has played a prominent part in national politics since the days of Grover Cleveland. He is going to be a banker. Among the Representatives who will not be heard in the Lower House this year is John Sharp Williams, who will renew old acquaintances in Yazoo, Mississippi. He expects to shoo Hernando De Soto Money out of the Senate in 1911. Another well known Representative who has temporarily abandoned his country to its fate is the Hon. Bourke Cockran of New York. In all there are seventy-eight Representatives who ceased to represent at midnight of Wednesday.

Perils of Hetch-Hetchy

I am informed by the Phelan-inspired dispatches from Washington that Theodore Roosevelt tells us to go ahead with our Hetch-Hetchy water scheme irrespective of Congressional approval, upon the permits already granted by the Secretary of the Interior. Evidently it is the intention of Theodore Roosevelt to put us in the hole if he can. And Mr. Phelan is also willing that we shall fall in. No doubt Mr. Phelan will come home after his long sojourn amid pleasures and palaces, prepared to give us a mighty shove into this Hetch-Hetchy abyss. If we are fools enough to be guided by Roosevelt and Phelan we shall deserve any fate that shall befall us. As a matter of fact the "permits" of the Interior Department are not worth the paper they are written upon if Congress does nor indorse them; and it has never been conceded even by his most ardent worshippers that Theodore Roosevelt is endowed with the divine gift of prophecy. What does President Roosevelt know about the future action of Congress? What influence on our behalf can Theodore Roosevelt exert from the jungle-wilds of darkest Africa upon the future action of Congress? But in spite of the palpable peril of the undertaking Mr. Phelan will advise us to "go ahead" with an enormous expenditure of money in the development of a water supply from the Hetch-Hetchy valley. Any loss that the taxpayers of San Francisco may sustain by adverse Congressional action will not affect Mr. Phelan. If we are taxed to pay the cost of experimenting with these Interior Department permits, that portion which falls upon Mr. Phelan will be readily met with an increase of the rent imposed on his tenants. Instead of overcharging on the value of his frontage by the foot he will reduce the feet to inches without lessening the price per foot which he will transfer to the price per inch.

Little Men Handling a Big Contract

But why do I strum so persistently on this harp that once through Tara's halls its soul of music shed? Why do I busy myself so constantly with the limelight cavortings of Phelan? Perhaps it is because Phelan is such a shining mark for criticism and censure that might be directed with equal deserving against a dozen other citizens of San Francisco who masquerade in the pretense of public-spirited devotion to the city's interests while secretly and assiduously striving to serve their own selfish purposes. In this Hetch-Hetchy muddle Mr. Phelan is the head and front of the offending, but there are others who are as capable of involving us deeper in the mire. Why, for instance, should such an important matter as this, the cost of which is to run into millions of dollars to be taxed against us for generations, be intrusted to the inadequate judgment of Supervisors Murphy and Connolly of the public service committee of the Board of Supervisors? I have never heard that Supervisors Murphy and Connolly were so eminent in this line of administration that they have been offered princely salaries to transfer their genius for this sort of thing from the public service to the service of the public service corporations. I cannot believe that the public service corporations would overlook Supervisors Murphy and Connolly if they were as capable of handling large affairs for the corporations as they assume to be in the matter of handling the same sort of affairs for the city. And I am not prepared to accept the presumption that Supervisors Murphy and Connolly prefer to order the expenditure of these millions on behalf of a municipal water supply rather than accept an offer to perform the same service for a corporation eager to pay them twenty times the amount they are receiving from the city as members of the public service committee of the Board of Supervisors. I must confess that I do not like the outlook for Hetch-Hetchy or for the taxpayers who will be compelled to pay cost of this prodigious experiment.

Genius in Obscurity

Marsden Manson is unquestionably a great engineer. Wallace and Goethals and Schussler are not in the same class with him. Everybody will agree with me in this estimate of Engineer Manson. His splendid work on the seawall established his reputation throughout the world. The State can boast that it never lost a cent by reason of any mistakes he may have made in his calculations; and any contractor that may have suffered from misinterpretation of the plain terms of his contract has only himself to blame for crass stupidity in overlooking the fine print of the contract. It has always been a source of wonderment to me that upon his world-wide reputation as an engineer capable of protecting the interests of his clients, Marsden Manson has never had a call, however low and soft, from the directors of the great engineering works outside of California. I have never heard him even mentioned in connection with the jetty work of the Mississippi; he has not, to my knowledge, ever been called as a consulting engineer by the canal builders and bridge builders and railroad builders of Europe, Africa or Asia; and it has always surprised me that Colonel Goethals was finally chosen to complete the Panama canal when Colonel Manson was so close at hand and probably also willing to undertake the job. However, it will be glory enough, probably, if Engineer Manson is permitted to engineer this Hetch-Hetchy water supply scheme. It is upon his estimates that we are "going ahead" as President Roosevelt commands and as Adviser Phelan advises. It is under his directions that we are preparing to convert Secretary Garfield's permits into reservoirs and pipe-lines. It is by his figures of the ultimate cost that we shall assess ourselves for the payment of the enormous debt de shall be compelled to assume. Therefore we must place our unbounded faith in the infallibility of Engineer Manson's engineering judgment and ability. Heaven help us if we lean on a broken reed! May the gods save us from bankruptcy if we shall find at last that Engineer Manson has miscalculated against us and that instead of costing the taxpayers $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 their water supply has cost them a hundred million! Some of us remember that the original estimate of the cost of our shattered city hall was only $2,000,000, but that its ultimate cost was upwards of $9,000,000, and less than $4,000,000 to show for it.

Frazzling Our "Social Fabric"

"Buzz-zz-zz-zz!" I wonder what that means. I find it in one of Kathleen Thompson's essays on "the social fabric" apparently descriptive of something that is happening to the "fabric." Miss Thompson says "it was audible in the corridors of the big hotels, it drifted about fashionable tea tables like an enveloping fog; it could be heard at the hairdressers, over the club luncheon, around the bridge table; and in short, wherever two or three or more society women met yesterday." That's the way we frame up a charade, only at the conclusion we say "What is it?" Miss Thompson omits the question. She leaves us to grope in the labyrinth of conjecture. What is it that can be audible in corridors and at the same time drift like an enveloping fog. Fogs are not audible except when the fog-horn blows. After many words, words, words such as Miss Thompson delights to put into her essays upon "the social fabric" I begin to understand that "Buz-zz-zz-zz!" is merely an onomatopoeic rendering of the gossip that is going round concerning the statement by Mrs. John Darling that our "social fabric" is built largely with bricks without straw; that its foundation is swamped in suds and dishwater; that its "front" is a veneer of gilt over the laths nailed by a plebeian ancestry and the mortar hodded by grandfathers with flannel in their mouths; that its maternal heraldry is a washboard 'scutcheon on a field or with quarterings of ancient unpaid board bills, sinister bars of soap, rum bottles, sugar barrels, chambermaid gear, cheap restaurants, miners' picks, Texas steers, and other impedimenta of horney-handed toil of which the possessors are heartily ashamed. This is my guess at the meaning of Miss Thompson's "Buzz-zz-zz!"

Uncertain Lineage of Modern "Families"

Now as may relate to Mrs. Darling's strictures on our "social fabric;" The criticism is not new. It is not even new with Mrs. Darling. She has frequently ripped the veneer from the "fabric," cracked the plaster in the "salons," stirred the soap suds in the cellar, exposed the washboard heirlooms stored in the garret, and other wise discomfited the parvenu dwellers in the "fabrics" whose only claim to "social recognition" is the money inherited from ancestors who spoke the dialect of the tenement districts and rose to eminence on the profits of lucky flukes in trade and industry, enabling their posterity to climb into "society" by meretricious aid of the greasy dollar of a commerce in ham and eggs, the dirty dollar of sewer contracts, the illegitimate dollar of a manipulated stock market in the days of the bonanza, and the easy dollar of fortunate real estate investments. This is not the first time that it has been charged that the bulk of our "cotilions" is raw and ragged—that, deprived of its money it would revert to its original obscurity in the side alleys of the town or return to its congenial environment of the corner grocery or the cheap lodging-house. It has long been the sneer of the Philistine that San Francisco's "elite" is absolutely grandfatherless and virtually fatherless and motherless in that it is ashamed of its parentage—a "society" orphaned at its birth. The obvious retort on Mrs. Darling, by our parvenus, is to the effect that if she doesn't like us she can keep out of "our midst." We cannot deny the superb aristocracy from which Mrs. Darling springs like Minerva from the brow of Jove, but we can insist without fear of proof to the contrary that after we have bridged the chasm of a plebeian and peasant ancestry we may mingle with the proudest "families" that ever sported a ducal tiara or buckled the belt of a Norman earl. And we may even surmise that in the day when knights were bold and barons held their sway the ancestry of Mrs. Darling may have been burnishing armor for our parvenus' ancestors or performing the menial service of tiring-women to the haughty dames whose twentieth-century offspring have come into their own. It's a topside t'other way sort of a world at its best, and it is never safe to "trace" the "family line" too far back because it may be found that it is waxed or looped at the other end as it is often hung with the lingerie of other folk at this extremity. I never boast of my own ancestry beyond the dark backward and abysm of the tenth generation because there are legends in my family that some of my forbears caught raiding in the lowlands of the north countree were incontinently hanged upon incontestible proof that the sheepskins were found in their sheal.

A Lesson in Grammar

A San Leandro schoolteacher, Benner by name, I believe, has been accused of whipping two little girls because they failed in their grammar lesson on the conjugation of the verb "to be," and insisted that "John and I am tired." Schoolmaster Benner had threatened to wallop all members of the grammar class who didn't "know" their grammar lesson, and he kept his word when these culprits were haled to his awful presence. At last accounts the pedagogue was in peril of being thrust forth from the San Leandro schoolhouse by an indignant populace who regard a knowledge of grammar as of less importance than the tender hide of the pupils. If I am in time, I would suggest a different course of action in dealing with this strap-wielding pundit. I will wager a dog-eared Lindley Murray against the fearfully and wonderfully inaccurate compilation of the State textbook series, that when Schoolmaster Benner uttered his threat against the ignoramuses of the San Leandro school he said: "I will punish all pupils who are deficient in their grammar lesson." Let the indignant populace of San Leandro first ascertain whether the accused schoolmaster did say "I will punish," and upon conviction let him be punished for his "deficiency" as he punished the little grammarless girls. For it is written in the grammar books that "shall" is the future auxiliary of the first person and "will" of the second and third persons. Through the use of "shall" the bare fact of futurity is signified by the word expressing the compulsion of events. The explanation of this distribution of the auxiliaries is found in considerations of courtesy or politeness. When a schoolmaster says "I shall punish," he uses a phrase which originally means that he is to be under external influence or compulsion, and he so far speaks humbly of himself, a thing quite becoming. But the case is altered when, addressing the grammarless kids, he says "You shall be punished;" this is equal to saying, "the power of external events will leave you no choice but to be punished. To use this form of language to another person has seemed want of due courtesy and consideration for the feelings of others; and accordingly we have departed from it, and adopted "will," which is the same as to say, "Your, or their, free will and pleasure will induce you, or them, to be punished." Even schoolmasters in their pedantic humor should be polite. Moreover, I think the grammarless kids were justified in their use of the singular form of the verb in the sentence, "John and I am tired." It has been conceded by grammarians far more eminent than Schoolmaster Benner, that English is "a grammarless tongue; "and upon this authority the little girls who were punished at the "will" of the San Leandro rhetor might have argued (preceding the conjugation of the strap) that "John is tired and I am tired," therefore "John and I am tired" or "John and I is tired." I'll bet a first edition of Ben Jonson's grammar book against the entire incomprehensible State series that Schoolmaster Benner can't explain satisfactorily nor lucidly why the verb "are" is substituted for the singular "is and am." Wherefore I condemn Schoolmaster Benner to forty lashes on the tenderest exposure of him, for trying to teach something of which he is himself profoundly ignorant.

Hail to The Colonel

Now that "Lucky" Baldwin has joined the innumerable caravan that leads to the undiscovered country where the best of us must lie in cold obstruction and to rot, I look forward to the coming of that dear devoted friend of the King of the Belgians, Colonel Henry T. Kowalsky, the natural champion of natural children, the tried and true protector of the illegitimate. If the Colonel hasn't an heir to the Baldwin millions it is because he has been shorn of his salient instinct. Years ago when Baldwin was running his hotel in this city Kowalsky was his star boarder, and it was said that the confidential relations existing between the jolly attorney and his rich landlord were indestructible. That this was not so was proved by the fire which consumed the hotel, rendered Kowalsky homeless and terminated his connection with the aged millionaire. Nevertheless it is believed that the Colonel obtained information in those days which should prove of some value at this time. For be it known "Lucky" Baldwin did not spend all his time, as the dailies would have us believe, in the pursuit of Mammon. Nor were fast horses his only diversion. He loved the caresses of women, and had he lived in other days he would have kept a seraglio in preference to a stable. It is of record that when he was sued once upon a time for breach of promise and charged by the fair plaintiff with seduction, he pleaded that his reputation for libidinosity was so well established that it was absurd for any woman to pretend that by him she had been deceived.

The Artistic Temperament

The highest genius is always regarded as essentric by the common herd, and therefore Charles Dutton of Berkeley, is the object of much interest to the people of the college town. Mr. Dutton is an artist and something of an esthete. Music is the art that he cultivates, the piano is the instrument which gives expression to his emotions, and it is by instructing others in the art which he has mastered that he lives in the purely material sense. Mr. Dutton is an excellent musician and a successful teacher, but there are other excellent musicians and other successful teachers; he is unique aside and apart from the musical instrument which he manipulates. For example he does all his own sewing and bakes all his cakes for the teas and receptions which he gives at his studio in Hillegas street. And these teas and receptions are notable events in the social and artistic life of Berkeley. The ladies say that Mr. Dutton is the most interesting of hosts. It is believed that Mr. Dutton lives alone, but this is not so. He lives with a lot of girls—charming creatures. They are not, women, of flesh and blood. They are the creatures of his imagination. His stove is Mollie, his dining-room table is Mary, his piano is his sweetheart, and when he puts a stick of wood in the fire he tells it to feed Mollie. He slipped on the polished floor one day and sprained his ankle, and he afterwards told a friend at the Hotel Carleton, where he breakfasts, that he might have been badly hurt if he had not caught hold of one of Mary's legs. There are

Omar and The Juice of the Grape

One of the cultured Burlingame set has taken me to task for not taking seriously Mirza Ali-Kuli Khan, the Persian scholar who has been dissenting from Edward Fitzgerald's literal interpretation of the Rubaiyat. I am rebuked for not appreciating the fact that Mirza ought to know, inasmuch as he is a Persian familiar with the mysticism of his countrymen. It happens to be for this very reason that I am not impressed with his efforts to construe the astronomer and tent-maker of Naishipur symbolically; for while Persians are addicted to mysticism Omar was not. If there is one fact well authenticated with reference to Omar, it is that he was disliked in his own time and in his own country for the ridicule which he showered on mysticism and for his epicurean audacity of thought and speech. Depend upon it that when Omar wrote of "jugs and jags" he meant the real thing. He was keen for the joy of living and it was his delight to exalt the gratification of sense even above that of intellect. It has long been the aim of Persians to enrol Omar in their own sect, and they have therefore insisted that he shadowed forth the Deity under the figure of wine; but mystically interpreted his quatrains are unintelligible, or, at least absurd.

Our New Banker

When the news of John Drum's election to the vice-presidency of the San Francisco Savings Union was given out the "street sat up and took notice. The immediate inference was that there had been something doing in financial circles, something of more than ordinary importance. It doesn't take the street long to get wise. The San Francisco Savings Union is one of the oldest and most reliable financial institutions in San Francisco, but the management thereof has not been identified in recent years with current activities. It was in need of an infusion of young blood, and it has received just what the doctor ordered. By the acquisition of John Drum the Savings Union has followed the example of many of the leading financial institutions of the East. In these days of industrial expansion the legal mind is becoming more and more in demand in commercial circles. John Drum is one of the brainiest of the representatives of the San Francisco bar, and by reason of his conservatism and his experience in the handling of big financial enterprises he is eminently qualified for the position which he has been chosen to fill. For years he has been associated with Garrett McEnerney, the universally acknowledged leader of the bar, and he has had exclusive charge of all the legal business of the Tevis estate. Mr. Drum is a man of the highest integrity, and he enjoys the confidence of the most powerful financiers on the coast.

Rivals For Prestige

It has been asked by the graft prosecution press why the lawyers defending Patrick Calhoun have not been willing to accept "the first twelve men" as a trial jury. The answer is various, but particularly it is retorted that the lawyers engaged in the defense of Patrick Calhoun are not such fools as the foolish editors of the graft prosecution insinuate in their fool question. The lawyers for the defense of Patrick Calhoun do not propose to incur the risk of a jury packed in the interest of the graft prosecution. On the other hand Special Prosecutor Heney is not willing to accept "the first twelve men in the box," nor any twelve of the first twelve hundred talesmen summoned, because he does not propose to risk loss of prestige by the verdict of acquittal that is likely to be rendered by an absolutely unbiased and unprejudiced jury passing on the question of whether the purchase of those boodling supervisors to whom the prosecution afterwards granted wholesale immunity was a direct bribery or the extortion of a hold-up accomplished without the personal knowledge of the defendant in this case. If Francis J. Heney does not convict Patrick Calhoun, all the glory that was his as the result of the conviction of Senator Mitchell will evaporate as the halo from the brow of a misfit saint. Even the ladies of the League of Justice will cease to adore him, and Professor Boke will look upon him with contempt— which would be as if Quirk or Snap should cease to regard Gammon as the shiftiest solicitor in London. It is, therefore, almost a matter of life or death with Heney to accomplish the conviction of Patrick Calhoun. It would be the crowning act of his career, his magnum opus, his masterpiece. Unless Heney can return to Roosevelt with the scalp of Patrick Calhoun at his belt he must retire crestfallen to his wickiup nevermore to go upon the warpath or the hunting path in quest of the big game that the mighty hunter and invincible warrior deems worthy of his sword and spear.

What Shall He Have Who Killed the Deer?

The conviction of Patrick Calhoun would confer prestige upon Judge Lawlor also. At this time Judge Lawlor is only a provincial magistrate; he is unknown beyond the snow line of the Sierra, and his name is of meager import even in the nearby villages of Reno and Searchlight. But let it gain bruit abroad that he was the presiding Judge in the court where Patrick Calhoun was convicted and the name of Lawlor will achieve national renown—able lawyers of the far eastern circuits will begin the study of his rulings; Judges of courts along the densely peopled Atlantic seaboard will cite his opinions as precedents; he will be quoted in the "reports" and "handed down" in the supreme courts. There is, then, to that extent a certain rivalry between Judge Lawlor and Special Prosecutor Heney. Both of them cannot shine from the reflected limelight of Patrick Calhoun now the dominant personality in the national view of this famous case. One or the other must take second place in the outcome of this trial. Lawlor must play second fiddle to Heney or Heney must subordinate the notes of his big bassoon to the deep organ tones of Lawlor. There can be no compromise between these two eminent jurists; one or the other must go under in the fierce struggle for prestige to accrue from the conviction of Patrick Calhoun. If Patrick Calhoun is not convicted, then must Judge Lawlor remain in the obscurity that now enshrouds him as one wrapped in the solitude of his originality. If Heney goes down in this combat before the foemen so worthy of his steel or under the adverse rulings of the court, obstructing the advance of his infantry or hobbling the hoofs of his charging cavalry, that will be the last of Francis J. Heney—even Rudolph Spreckels will tell him that he can no longer be officer of his. Heney has staked everything on this hazard. I don't know what Judge Lawlor has staked. But I am of the opinion that if they don't get busy before a jury pretty soon the indictments against Patrick Calhoun will expire by the statute of limitation and that neither Heney nor his Honor, Judge Lawlor, will be allowed to ante for the jackpot.

Wheeler Preferred

Mr. Heney, by the way, is beginning to show signs of the wear and tear on his nerves. His beheavior nowadays is that of a man who is at war even with himself. Never of an amiable disposition he has grown more querulous than ever, and he has become impatient of the most trivial opposition. According to gossip that emanates from the sanhedrim of the civic patriots Mr. Heney feels that his devotion to the interests to which he consecrated himself more than two years ago is not appreciated. Mr. Spreckels had a chance when his father died to vindicate his confidence in Mr. Heney, but he turned all the luxuriant pickings of a fat estate over to Charley Wheeler. Now Mr. Wheeler has given very little encouragement to the graft prosecution. As Mr. Spreckels's regularly retained attorney and personal friend, he was under obligations that he could not gracefully ignore, and on several occasions he expressed his sympathy with his client's designs and aspirations, but on the whole he has done very little toward aiding and abetting Mr. Heney. Nevertheless Mr. Wheeler is to manage the Spreckels estate without Mr. Heney's assistance. Whether Mr. Heney's querulousness is due in a measure to disappointment at not being selected for the attorney-generalship in Mr. Taft's cabinet, is a question which has been under discussion of late. It is said that he was a candidate for the job, and that Mr. Wheeler was also much to Mr. Heney's indignation.

Demosthenes Hearst

Mr. Hearst, writing in his newspapers of "the tribute" paid to him by Admiral Sperry compares himself to Demosthenes and in that parallel unconsciously confirms the opinion of his loathsome contemporaries that he is a demagogue. Admiral Sperry is quoted by Mr. Hearst as saying that when the officers of the American navy on their voyage around the world read what Mr. Hearst was writing about them they laid their hands on their swords and said: "Let them come on." Which inspires Mr. Hearst to write in his newspapers that "the ancients, comparing Demosthenes and Cicero, said, 'How beautifully. Cicero speaks,' but when the Athenians heard Demosthenes, they shouted: 'Let us march against Philip! Let us conquer him or die.'" And from this ancient fable Mr. Hearst draws a modern instance in a comparison between his loathsome contemporaries and himself conceding to those contemporaries the excellencies of elegant English and intelligent comment, but reserving for himself the power of a diction that compels "every soldier-sailor to lay his hand upon his sword and say, 'Let our country's enemies come on!'" in loud and conspicuous capital letters. The comparison is unfortunate. Mr. Hearst as the twentieth century Demosthenes is accurate enough as a descriptive parallel, but Mr. Hearst was in such haste to find a fitting and notorious classical exemplar that he did not pause to analyze the name of his prototype conferred upon the famous Greek orator because he was constantly playing to the gallery—demos, the people, and thenes, the power of; the power of the people; or, as it was paraphrased by the Greeks "the advocate of the polloi—Demosthenes the demagogus." It is possible that Mr. Hearst will not deny himself a demagogue; but if he does he must retract his comparison with the noisy Greek.

"Knitters" of the Graft Prosecution

The women of the Ladies' Annex of the League of Justice who have been in attendance on the trials of the graft cases have been likened to the "Knitters" of the French revolution who sat under the guillotine and threaded into their fabrics the names and titles and "crimes" of the aristocrats whose heads fell under the knife. The comparison is not inept. We are all familiar with the descriptions of the Jacobin ladies who gloated over the victims of the revolutionary tribunal; and I have seen the ladies of the League of Justice Annex in attendance on the trials of the men accused by the graft prosecution. Perhaps our ladies are better looking than those who "sat knitting in the sun," but I am sure that the expressions of their countenances were similar. Two kinds of women are sent by the League of Justice to these trials—old ladies whose domestic usefulness has passed and old maids whose domestic usefulness has never been tried, and probably never will be if it shall be contingent upon the getting of husbands. However, I am somewhat in doubt as to my last inference, for there are so many queer folk in the men's section of the League of Justice that there is a remote possibility of some of them going a little farther in their fanaticism and offering wedlock to these daughters of the graft horse leech. The faces of these women indicate the condition of their minds and hearts. They are as hard as the face of a gargoyle provided the features of the gargoyle are carved in flint instead of marble or sandstone. Their eyes gleam with a merciless glint. All men accused at this bar are guilty and it is a "travesty on justice" as Professor Boke would say, that they are not already in the penitentiary. The lawyers who are defending these men are accomplices after the fact and ought to be prosecuted in company with the principals. This conclusion as to the state of mind of these "knitters" is logical from the way in which they grind their teeth every time Earl Rogers drenches Special Prosecutor Heney with his sarcasm or when Stanley Moore defies the threats of the court bully. And these faces are only placid when Judge Lawlor rules with the Heney interpretation of the law—something resembling a smile creeps across those ordinarily sour visages when the learned court rebukes the defense for attempting to apply real law in the conduct of the case. I must confess, with all due deference to the sex whose crowning glory is tender sympathy and whose noblest function is motherhood, that I would not like to be accused before a jury of women drawn from the Ladies' Annex of the League of Justice. I say "accused," for I am sure that my guilt or innocence would not weigh the fraction of a tenth part of a scruple in the verdict of these iron-faced women. I am convinced that were I as innocent of all crime as was Justin the martyr or Savanarola the blameless, I would be convicted—no proof to the contrary of an accusation by Mr. Spreckels or Mr. Heney would be sufficient to save me from the lions or the faggot—the lean thumbs of the vestals would inevitable point downward and the strident voices of the old ladies would cry out for my destruction.

Irish's Epistolary Gem

Colonel John P. Irish is mentioned by a writer in McClure's as a man who made a deep impression on Grover Cleveland by means of a letter. Shortly after Cleveland's election to the Presidency Irish, who was then the editor of the Daily Alta of this city, was endorsed by the Democrats of the legislatures of Oregon, Idaho and Wyoming for Secretary of the Interior. About the same time the Democrats in the Legislature of this state proposed, with the approval of Mr. Irish, to give him a similar endorsement. He thereupon took occasion to write to Mr. Cleveland and explain that he was not a candidate. "I have felt," he said, "that candidacy in the current meaning thereof, for a place in your official family, is not becoming." He added:

> Fifty and more years ago, when the western prairies were untracked, the way across them from one post to another was sometimes marked by a deep furrow, plowed under contract by some stout pioneer. Half a century later, I have found these furrows still plainly marked, and there has arisen before me again the team, the plow, and the plowman drawing the guiding mark through a wilderness.
> After we are all gone, men will pause by the furrow you are to make in the history of our country and will say, "here the plowman passed; and time toils in vain to conceal his furrow."
> My friend, you are selecting your team, but you and no other must hold the plow. If I should go into history as one who helped to pull it, I should be glad, but I shall have always the pleasure of believing in the plowman and knowing that the furrow is to endure.

"Though Colonel Irish was not appointed to the Cabinet, he won the esteem and confidence of President Cleveland and was appointed by him to the office of Naval Officer which he has held ever since despite the vigorous opposition of Republican job chasers. Perhaps in time it will be learned that Colonel Irish wrote letters to President McKinley and President Roosevelt just as beautiful and just as touching as the one received by Mr. Cleveland. There are not many Republican job chasers that can surpass Irish in the art epistolary.

Some Eloquent Figures

The story of San Francisco's reconstruction cannot be more succinctly and effectively told than by quoting the following tabulated statement of the building permits issued for the period between April 18 1906, and March 1, 1909.

Classification.	Number.	Value.
Class A	77	$18,649,982
Class B	108	7,949,831
Class C	1,341	41,294,879
Frame	12,021	49,389,075
Alterations	6,100	9,384,540
Total	19,647	$126,668,307
Adding 15 per cent for undervaluation in applying for permit		$145,668,553

The significance of these figures will be appreciated when it is remembered that according to a careful estimate made after a minute examination of the assessor's books, the value of the 28,186 buildings destroyed amounted to $105,000,000. A comparison of the ratio of value between the old and the new tells in a nutshell how much finer a city has been built than the one that was the center of the commercial activity of the metropolis.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

A much stronger feeling has been in evidence in the New York Stock market during the current week. Pool operations were manifestly more active than during the previous week. It was thought the big slump in the steel securities might cause a general unloading by the pools that have been responsible for much of the past six months' advance. The market shows signs of being in an oversold condition. The weak holders were forced to sell ont; and the short sellers undoubtedly sold more than they wish they had, a circumstance that improves the situation. It will be surprising if market values do not go higher before any material decline appears. The big reduction in steel prices must result in great financial help to railroads. The demand for steel products should show an enormous increase in the near future. The result of the cut in steel prices will show it was the beginning of the end of dullness in that particular line of trade. It will stimulate building and other operations. The next move in the way of a reduction will be in rails, which must join the procession. The Copper Metal trade appears more ready to buy now that copper metal has been reduced to 12 1-2 cents. The decline in this commodity affects small producers more generally than the larger concerns. It is reported the Amalgamated companies, as well as the Phelps Dodge Company, have agreed to reduce their production ten per cent; this will help to exhaust the large supplies on hand. Few mines can produce copper at 12 1-2 cents and show a profit. It will require six months to reduce supplies where an advance in the price of metal would be justified. At low prices copper will meet greater consumption than otherwise. The next thing to unsettle values will be the tariff question and spring crop prospects. The market will hinge upon these two factors for some time. It is hardly reasonable to anticipate any measure of a radical character in the way of tariff reductions but there are certainly reasons why some reductions should be made. It is more than likely, however, the country is prepared for such reductions and that no particular ill effect will be felt when they are put into force. Money continues in good supply both at financial and interior centers.

The Cotton Market the past week has been, as was the case the week before, dull, and for the most part, uneventful. About the only feature to which importance could have been attached was the first notice day for March delivery. This also failed to incite more than momentary interest, and the market soon lapsed into its usual dullness. This state of affairs cannot last much longer as there are so many things just ahead that are sure to cause more or less activity and attract public attention. The first of these features, perhaps, and one which in years past has never failed to be attended by fluctuations of wide range, affecting the market either favorably or adversely, will come on March 20th, when the United States Bureau of the Census will publish the last of a series of ten reports showing the total amount of cotton in bales including linters, which has been ginned from the growth of 1908. Immediately, or maybe an hour or two after this report has been made public, the annual report of Secretary Wilson of the U. S. Department of Agriculture will be read from the rostrum of the New York Cotton Exchange. This report will show the season's commercial crop in bales, and will settle for all times the much disputed question of the size of last year's crop, upon which at the outset of the season guesses ranged from 12,500,000 to 14,000,000 bales.

Despite the estimate of the Agricultural Department for a yield of 12,960,000 bales, there still remains considerable difference of opinion among individuals, the bulls contending that not over 13,000,000 bales will be shown, whilst the bears claim that the final report will be greatly in excess of this amount. The conservative element, however, has settled upon 13,100,000 bales as being the probable figures, and as spinners' takings are running upon a record breaking scale, takings by the world thus far this season being 7,737,000 bales against 6,960,000 bales last year, and 7,640,000 the year before, the latter being the record up to that time, the total for the season having been 13,060,000 bales. It is quite likely that all of this season's crop will be required before cotton of the new crop begins to move next October in sufficient volume to prove of any weight upon the market. Meanwhile each day brings us nearer to the planting season for the new crop which begins about March 15th, and in this connection it will be well to bear in mind the following press dispatch from San Antonio, Texas, under date of February 27th: "With practically no rain in December, less in January, and none to date in February, conditions in southwest Texas are really getting serious. The grass and water are both scarce on the ranches, the cattle are poor and in many places the sheep are reported to be starving. Many farmers report it too dry for plowing, and unless there is rain soon, the plainting of corn and cotton will be very materially delayed. The spring and winter have probably been the dryest in the past ten years. The only farming that has been going on is where it is possible to irrigate."

Last year there were good rains during the winter and the crop was large, about 4,000,000 bales. Year before last, although there was more moisture in the ground than this year, the Texas crop was small, about 2,221,000 bales. As to this year's crop there is much uncertainty, owing to the lack of moisture. Indications point to a continuance of dry weather for the southwest, and as Texas raises about 30 per cent of the cotton crop of the United States, future developments along this line may soon assert themselves, and cause the remnant of this year's crop, as well as October, December and January of the new crop, to sell at much higher figures.

The cereal markets have shown marked strength, May wheat in the Chicago market selling up to $1.19 1-2 per bushel, a price not seen since the Joe Leiter deal. One of the striking incidents in this advance was the resolutions put before the State Legislature of Minnesota thanking the Chicago Board of Trade operators for causing the advance. What a contrast to the members of other legislatures who want to down legitimate speculation. It goes to show that supply and demand govern the cereal markets. The people who are responsible for the present high prices for wheat were bearish and short sellers last year when crop conditions pointed to a large crop, but when conditions changed they also changed. All the shorts in the world can't depress prices when a crop is actually short, nor can the bulls soar prices when there is an over-production.

The Gifted Mrs. Darling

No one who is familiar with the ancestry and social career of Mrs. John A. Darling was in the least surprised at her outspoken comments on the absurd exclusiveness of local society patronesses, and no one expects her to abate one inch from the position she has taken. All her life she has been a persistent stickler for what she has felt were her rights, and whether she inherited a penchant for litigation from her father, the late Judge Hastings, or whether, from living with the law, as it were, she has felt less in awe of the powers that be, it is well known that she has never hesitated to carry her war into Africa. Mrs. Darling has never concealed her contempt for the social climbers recruited from the ranks of the new rich. She was, so to speak, born in the inner sanctuary, and she married into the "service," and she has traveled extensively both at home and abroad, and therefore she is better qualified than most women to speak with a tongue of authority and whenever Mrs. Darling speaks it is because she has something to say. What she has to say is generally worth hearing. With her conversation is an art and epigram an essential by-product. Her father was one of the most learned lawyers that ever contributed lustre to the local bar, and it has been said that the only one of his offspring that inherited his mental power was his daughter Clara, who is now the wife of Colonel Darling, a retired army officer, a man of exceptional culture, who has won considerable fame as a composer of music.

MRS. JOHN A. DARLING.

Who caused a sensation in local swelldom by her comments on the patronesses of the Colonial Ball.

Some Darling Epigrams

From friends of Mrs. Darling who have talked with her since the publication of her interview about the Colonial patronesses, I learn that she is especially severe in her strictures on the ostentation of our smart set. Here are some of Mrs. Darling's epigrams that are now going the rounds of the old set:

"The husbands of these patronesses are groaning under their debts and yet the wives are splurging as though they had money to throw to the birds."

The ill-breeding of present-day society in San Francisco can be seen through its sheath gown. The daughters of our new rich have no respect for old age. Perhaps it is because they have contempt for their parents."

"None of the patronesses of the Colonial balls ever had a foot under Mrs. Lloyd Tevis's mahogany; yet San Francisco society was branded by Mrs. Tevis. If you cannot claim descent from Mrs. Tevis's set it is because you are of mushroom growth."

"Twenty years ago at Del Monte I snubbed the founders of the Burlingame clique because I was intolerant of their bad manners, and they have never forgiven me, but if they had any sense they would have been grateful to me for inducing Mrs. John F. Swift to lend the eclat of her presence to one of their functions."

"In the old days when Mrs. Tevis was the leader my father and Lloyd Tevis and J. B. Haggin were associated together in the law business, and our families were regulating the social amenities of San Francisco when the parents of the founders of Burlingame were in trade doing things to one another that produced litigation. In those days you didn't have to have money to get into society, but you did have to have education and refinement."

Our Provincial Aristocracy

Despite the feeling which has been engendered over the Darling-Alexander controversy, no one denies that Mrs. Darling has hit the nail square on the head in some of her references to the local aristocracy. She made some pointed allusions to the men in trade who are the backers of our local high set, but I have always understood that Burlingame exclusives could trace their family trees to the roots in blacksmiths, teamsters, grocers, milliners and other humble tradesfolk and handicraftsmen. Burlingame, when it first unfurled its banner and took its stand amongst the "old county families" of San Mateo, had to fight for recognition, and the conviction of superiority has never been wiped out. Despite the wealth and all its visible display, and encouragement of spectacular sport, it was only grudgingly and by degrees that San Mateo came to call at the country places not quite so far down the peninsula, and even yet there is a perceptible difference in the regard extended to the Parrotts, the Howards, the Eyres, the Athertons and the other original inhabitants and those who came later. Not two years ago Vicomtess de Tristan in organizing an exclusive dancing club for San Mateo, endeavored to draw a hard and fast line on the north side, but more liberal ideas prevailed and the bars were let down after all. However, it mattered little, for the affair was short-lived. It was "too good form, you know," all form and no fun, and so, offered no inducements for its perpetuation. It is rather amusing, any way one looks at it, to consider these claims and counter claims of lineage and superior exclusiveness in a state which has not yet celebrated its sixtieth birthday and was colonized by a hardy race of adventurers whose sole intention was to "make a pile and go home to the states." Whatever the outcome of the controversy the Colonial affairs have proved so popular and enjoyable that there is universal hope amongst those who participated in the balls that the organization will be perpetuated and next winter will see a new series of equally enjoyable affairs.

Why She Has Eschewed Social Functions

While some surprise was manifested at the absence of Mrs. Andrew Welch from both the last Greenway Assembly and the Colonial Mardi Gras, few of even the most intimate friends knew that her seclusion was the result not of any aversion to fancy dress but of the death of a near relative. It was not until Mrs. Welch appeared at church on Ash Wednesday garbed in the deepest of mourning that it became known that her father's sister, Miss de Laveaga, had died suddenly in Mexico. The Welches, with their children, left last week for a trip to Yosemite. It was Mrs. Welch's first visit to the valley for, though she often planned the trip in her maiden days, she was never able to carry it through. Her parents spent their honeymoon in Yosemite, and for some reason best known to himself, her father never cared to revisit the scene. The Welches will be the first to reopen their San Mateo home but it will be for a month only, as they have about concluded to divide the summer again between Lake Tahoe and Santa Barbara. Mrs. Welch has been one of the most frequent and charming entertainers this winter. She has a genius for developing unique and original ideas which have given to each of her affairs the novelty of surprise which warded off the least suspicion of stiffness or formality.

The Hit of the Evening

One of the most attractive girls at the Colonial fancy dress ball was Marian Miller, who assumed the character of a trained nurse, and entered, pushing in front of her a small automobile in which were her two charges, Harriett Alexander and Suzanne Kirkpatrick, dressed alike as babies. The trio became at once the center of an interested group eager to guess their identity, and the careful guardian maintained her character by calling out in terrified tones: "Are you antiseptic?" Have you been properly sterilized?" "Don't come near them," and other commands and injunctions such as are expected of the highly developed modern nurse. Later on, however, and still in accord with the course of nurses when not under surveillance, it must be confessed that she let the babies escape from under supervision and follow their own sweet wills, while she enjoyed the dancing. "Don't Marian look dandy this evening?" was the remark addressed to one of the men. "You bet she does!" was his fervent reply. "It would make a fellow want to be sick to be taken care of by somebody who looks like that." She was one of the hits of the evening.

The Czar Was "Indisposed"

Ned Greenway has appeared in public again and is welcomed back after his brief temporary retreat. His anticipatory zeal as well as his participation in the celebration of the birthday of the father of his country left him rather "unfit for publication," and a retirement from social activities was found expedient, hence his absence from the Colonial ball. Ned is too clever a hand to make a display of professional jealousy, and though his non-appearance caused some comment it is evident enough that the excuse put forth by his friends, that of indisposition, was not far-fetched. At all events the gossips have agreed that rivalry had nothing to do with it, whatever the brand of patriotism which laid him under tribute.

Burlingame Deserted

The regular spring exodus to the south has begun in earnest. Not only have the majority of the debutante band departed for Santa Barbara to recuperate after the winter gaities, but Burlingame, likewise, is looking deserted. Polo ponies have been sent on ahead for the coming season of games at Santa Barbara and Coronado, and the best players, well in trim after the winter's assiduous practice, are preparing to follow. Mr. and Mrs. Tom Driscoll were the first to leave. They are visiting Mrs. Driscoll's parents, Admiral and Mrs. Bacon, at Santa Barbara, and will be the nucleus of the regular San Francisco colony in whose honor much entertaining is planned. The Frank Carolans will leave shortly, with their guest, Miss Katrina Page-Brown, and the balance of the polo team will be on the way by the middle of next week. With this influx of the smart society set Santa Barbara is wearing anything but a penitential air.

A Surprise From Paris

The announcement of the engagement of Florence Whittel to Kurt Albert, came as a pleasant surprise to the friends of the Whittels on this coast, particularly as there followed so swiftly the announcement that the marriage is to be quietly celebrated in Paris on the eighth of this month. While most of Florence Whittel's education was received abroad, she was born in this city and spent her childhood here, and it was in San Francisco that she made her formal debut some six or seven years ago. Rumor, at that time, connected her name with that of young Howard, "Teddy" Howard, as he is familiarly called. His sister, Frances Howard and Florence Whittel were inseparable and she and "Teddy" rode, walked, danced and played tennis together down at Burlingame until everyone was nodding and smiling and patiently waiting for the inevitable announcement. Suddenly Lydia Lansdale appeared on the scene as the guest of her brother's "in-law," Bishop Nichols' family, "Teddy" Howard succumbed to the charms of the fair eastern girl, and their marriage took place shortly after her arrival. Florence Whittel has spent her time between Burlingame and Paris since then, with one or two Oriental trips as a variation. She is exceptionally clever in both conventional and unconventional lines, for she not only sings and plays and handles both brush and pencil extremely well, but she is an adept at sleight of hand performances, a talent which she developed in Paris. Her expertness in feats of legerdemain have caused her to be always in great demand as an assistant at charity entertainments, where she was always sure to be a striking and popular feature.

A Mi-Careme Ball

It seems that society has not finished with fancy dress balls after all, though Ash Wednesday usually sees the last of that particular form of diversion until the ushering in of another season. Rumor has it that the officers of the Presidio will celebrate Mi-Careme with a bal masque, and pleasant memories of the last fancy dress ball held at the hospitable Presidio club are too fresh not to awaken joyous anticipations of another frolic. The lenten season is young yet, and maids and matrons alike have been rejoicing in the opportunity to make up for their lost hours of sleep, and finding the comparative leisure of their days a pleasing contrast to the mad whirl of pleasure of the last three months, but they frankly confess that by mid-lent the pendulum will have swung to the opposite point of its arc, and a lively Army hop on a large scale wil be a welcome diversion. The two Mardi Gras balls which were features of the last week of the social season have whetted appetite for a third, and as there is something infinitely alluring in the prospect of dancing with an unknown, the affair is foredestined to be a success, and well attended by all who are fortunate enough to be included in the invitation list.

The Feminine Raffles

The loss of Miss Jennie Crocker's pearl necklace calls to mind many other stories of the disappearance of valuables and the losses sustained by people in society, where the appropriation has been traced directly to some one of the guests. The first wife of the late General Barnes dropped a valuable point lace handkerchief while taking part in a quadrille at an exclusive society affair. As she saw another woman pick it up, she felt no uneasiness, concluding, as a matter of course, that it would be restored to her as soon as circumstances brought loser and finder together. When the evening was drawing to a close without bringing any movement towards a surrender, Mrs. Barnes sought out the young woman in the dressing room and quietly asked for her property. To her amazement she was met by a flat denial that any such handkerchief was in her possessioin and an intimation that a grievous error had been committed in entertaining such a supposition.

Coming down nearer to date, a well-known young society woman was divorced and it is an open secret that, whatever the grounds upon which the complaint and action were nominally based, the real facts are that the limit of her husband's patience had been reached. He was simply tired of being constantly called upon to make good the losses sustained by hostesses wherever his wife had been entertained and at every hotel where they had stopped.

An Embarrassing Situation

An amusing, though embarrassing scene took place at a recent bridge party where, amongst the guests, were a young matron and an old acquaintance of hers who has spent several years abroad and only just returned to California, so that she has not yet had time to inform herself thoroughly on the progress of events. The marriage of the younger woman had taken place during her absence, and finding herself seated opposite, this being the first opportunity which she had had of offering her felicitations personally, she proceeded to do so somewhat effusively, making inquiries for the husband's welfare, and adding: "I was always a great admirer of his, and was so glad to hear of your happy marriage. And so you are living in a beautiful home in Piedmont. I will come over soon to see you." It might have proceeded indefinitely had not the moment for changing partners rescued the young matron from an awkward position, for, instead of living in blissful enjoyment of a beautiful home and each other's society, the couple have been separated for months past.

She Staggered Him

One of the most conventional of the debutantes recently had occasion to rid herself of the attentions of a persistent admirer, and since he was impervious to milder hints, she simply swung the pendulum to the other extreme, for one occasion only. They met at one of the Greenway dances and the gentleman in the case, having no sympathy with the liberties, not to say licenses assumed by the modern maid, immediately fell victim to the charms of this quiet, self-contained, studious young girl. Unfortunately he was not "the right man," and therefore his persistent regard became so borous that its object was driven to desperation until she hit upon a plan for effectively routing him. One evening, when he called, he was ushered into the library where he found the young lady with a cigarette between her lips and a decanter and glass at her elbow, seemingly enjoying herself to the full. He was simply staggered. He attempted to make conversation but words died in his throat, but at last he managed to inquire how long it had been since she had adopted such ways. Lightly she answered that she had always done that sort of thing, and now that they were getting to be such very good friends she no longer felt it necessary to conceal her pleasant vices through fear of driving him away. The ruse worked admirably. The superfluous one took his departure after a very short call and a formal leave taking, and then the poor girl hurried to her bed, for it was her first cigarette and her first highball, and she was beginning to pay the penalty of her indulgence. However, she feels that the end justified the means, for the vanquished swain has ceased to haunt her vicinity since the episode.

Colonel John C. The season is at its height in Santa Barbara, and the Hotel Potter is the scene of many gay festivities. The first note in the harmony of summer festivities out of town was struck last week when a surprise party was tendered to Professor W. L. Hovey at Hotel Rusticano, Camp Meeker. The affair was arranged by the many friends of the professor as an indication of their pleasure on learning that the dancing and other amusements planned for this popular near-by summer resort during the coming season will be under his management. The evening was spent in dancing and games suitable to an informal gathering of friends, and at midnight a bountiful repast was set forth in the dining room. The professor, on being called upon for a toast, responded feelingly and eloquently. Those whose presence and cooperation aided in making the affair a success were: Professor and Mrs. Hovey, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Newland, Mr. and Mrs. J. D. CHRONICLE

Spring Fashion Number

To be issued Wednesday, March 24th

¶ The latest fashions and all that pertains to fashions for women, men, girls and boys, with many new and original ideas.

¶ The Spring Fashion Number of the San Francisco Chronicle will be issued late enough to contain the latest spring and summer news of importance from Paris, and early enough to be of material assistance to you in preparing your spring wardrobe.

¶ We shall treat, simply and in detail, every matter which has to do with dress--not only the gowns of various sorts for different occasions, but wraps, millinery, head and neckwear, shoes, gloves, jewelry and accessories of every sort, how to dress the hair, with some instructions on the delicate care of the skin, etc.--all of those matters in which a little knowledge make a small amount of time devoted to the toilet amply repay for itself.

¶ Whatever decree Paris and the Parisian couturiers shall render for the women in their world, our makers of costumes, our stores, will listen to most eagerly, and you, Madame, will advantageously do the same.

¶ This number will be complete and fully illustrated. We have spared no pains or expense to make it not only the most attractive but the most useful number we have ever issued.

Wednesday, March 24th.

Odd Things in the World

In Madrid Tuesday is considered an unlucky day. For many years no marriages have been celebrated on Tuesday.

A Prince of Wales if of age from his birth and a chair is placed for him on the right side of the throne in the House of Lords.

The King of Norway and the Prince of Montenegro are the only two rulers of Europe who are taller than their wives.

In Sweden the barber will shave you for six cents, but you must wash your own face afterward and comb your own hair.

The first word in a physician's prescription is "a recipe" abbreviated to R, which is a relic of the astrological symbol of Jupiter.

The Burmese have a preference for coins bearing female heads, believing that those with male heads are less lucky and do not "make money."

Foot soldiers are called infantry from the fact that the name was first applied to a body of men collected by the Infante, or heir apparent of Spain, for the purpose of rescuing his father from captivity amongst the Moors.

There is in the library of Dr. Williams of London a copy of the Bible in shorthand. It is exquisitely written and is said to have belonged to an apprentice of the time of James II, who feared that the Bible was about to be suppressed and so wrote this copy.

The largest swinging bell in the world hangs in the church of St. Francis de Sales, in the outskirts of Cincinnati. It takes six men to ring it, and by reason of the immense volume of sound which it produces they are obliged to swathe their ears in heavy cloth. Only on special occasions, such as Easter, Christmas Day, Michaelmas and Memorial Day are the peals rung from the monster bell.

One of the most impressive of the ceremonies prescribed by the Navy Regulations of the United States, is that followed when a naval vessel on its way up or down the Potomac river passes Washington's tomb at Mount Vernon. When the vessel approaches Mount Vernon the marine guard and the band are paraded, the ship's bell is tolled and the colors half-masted. When opposite the tomb the bugles sound "taps", the marine guard presents arms and all the officers and men stand at attention and salute. Unfortunately the Potomac is such a small stream that only the dispatch boats, the President's yacht and a few of the smaller gun boats and cruisers that occasionally visit Washington on ceremonial occasions, are able to make their way so far inland, but for such as do the ceremonial is strictly observed.

Stage

Fitch as a Stage Manager

Clyde Fitch, America's most prolific dramatist, whose comedy, "Girls" will open at the Van Ness Theatre next Monday night for a limited engagement of one week, with special matinee Wednesday and Saturday, is considered one of the best stage directors in the country. He not only writes his own plays but selects the actors and rehearses them. He is the only author in this country who does this work, as the average manager has his own staff of stage directors, who consider suggestions from authors unworthy of notice. Fitch, however, has established a position for himself in the theatrical scheme which permits him to dictate, and with him not a detail is left to the professional producer. He explains each character to the actor who is assigned to portray it and every bit of acting is fully worked out. He has the faculty of being able to impart his individual idea to the player and this fact is probably responsible for a great measure of his success. It is a common occurrence for Fitch to make radical changes in a play while it is in rehearsal. It is said that two new characters were added to "Girls" just one week before it opened at Daly's theatre, New York.

Pictures Japanese Drama for the Alcazar

"The Darling of the Gods," a drama of old Japan by David Belasco and John Luther Long, will be given its first presentation by a stock company next Monday evening at the Alcazar. No other stock theatre would undertake such a stupendous production is this. Belasco & Mayer have undertaken it only because of their unequalled mechanical and artistic resources and because they had David Belasco's direct personal counsel while rehearsing the players and preparing the inanimate accessories. Besides, they were exclusively enabled to obtain much of the properties and costumery used in the original New York production. In the play there are thirty-seven speaking characters and many silent auxiliaries. Its action takes place in Japan during the period of the "sword edict," when the Mikado took away the weapons of the Samurai (two-sword men). A little band of these warriors refused to obey the imperial decree and became outlawed, and the plot hinges upon the love of their chieftain, Prince Kara, for the Princess Yo San. Preceding the play proper are several beautiful pictures which convey the audience into the atmosphere of old Japan. The first act shows the banquet hall of the Prince of Tosan, who is giving a feast in honor of Prince Kara, by whom his life and that of his daughter, Yo San, had been saved a few days previously. The Prince of Tosan is a faithful adherent of the Emperor, and among those invited to the feast are the Minister of War and other high officials who have been hunting Prince Kara and his little band, but Prince Kara feels in honor bound to attend the banquet, to say nothing of his desire to meet Yo San. On his way to the palace, however, he is attacked by hirelings of the Minister of War and is severely wounded, but escapes and attends the feast. While bidding his host good-by he almost swoons from the pain of his wounds, and Yo San, who reciprocates his love, hides him in a little house in her garden, and nurses him back to strength. In the following scene Prince Kara has been captured by his enemies, and, after refusing to disclose the hiding place of his followers, is placed in the torture chamber. Yo San secures his release by giving the Minister of War a paper showing where the outlawed band is concealed. Then is shown the last stand of the outlaws against the Emperor's musketmen. Only with their swords the outlaws go forth to their death, the scene being one of the most impressive every staged. Prince Kara is allowed to die by his own hand, and the last act presents the tryst of death between him and Yo San. An epilogue picture shows the lost souls of the dead who have betrayed their trust wandering in the river of death. All the Alcazar favorites will be favorably cast in "The Darling of the Gods."

Princess Theatre

The new Musical Comedy Company at the Princess has scored a tremendous hit which is not surprising when it is remembered that the cast contains such clever names as May Boley, Frank Moulan, Helen Darling, Ethel Du Fre Houston, Zoe Barnett, Fred Mace, James Stevens, Bud Ross and Bert Phoenix. In consequence of its great success The Rounders will be continued all next week. It will be succeeded by The Sultan of Sulu in which Frank Moulan in the name part will repeat the greatest triumph of his career. "The Rounders" is one of the cleverest of musical comedies. It is one of the few musical comedies that have survived through the years, and that bear reproduction.

The Lhevinne Concerts

This Sunday afternoon March 7th, at Christian Science Hall, our music lovers will be introduced to the Josef Lhevinne, the young Russian pianist, who has been hailed as the successor to the great Rubinstein. The program to be given includes the "Sonata" op. 27 No. 1 (Quasi una Fantasia) by Beethoven; "Toccata" by Schumann; "Impromptu" in G major, Schubert; "Presto" E major, Mendelssohn; "Etudes" Op. 25; "Nocture" G major, and "Polonaise" XXA flat major by Chopin; Liszt's "Loreley"; Rubinstein's "Staccata Etude", and the brilliant transcription of the "The Blue Danube" by Schulz- Evler. The only evening concert will be given Thursday, the 11th, and on this occasion the much discussed transcription of the Bach "Chaconne" by Busoni will be played and also three arrangements of old masterpieces by Godowsky, and Schumann's "Carnevale." The last concert will be given Sunday afternoon March 14th, when the Brahms "Sonata" in F minor will be the special feature.

BLANCHE STODDARD

Who will return to the Valencia Theatre next week in "Under the Red Robe."

Seats are on sale at Sherman Clay & Co.'s, corner of Sutter and Kearny streets, and the box office at the hall will be open Sunday, after 10 a. m. A special program made up from the three San Francisco offerings and including the Bach "Chaconne", "Carnevale," etc., will be given in Oakland Friday afternoon at half past three at "Ye Liberty Playhouse." Seats for this event will be on sale Monday morning at the box office of the theatre. Manager Will Greenbaum predicts that Lhevinne will create a veritable sensation. His playing is of quite a different style from any pianist we have heard for a long time.

"Marrying Mary"

"Babes in Toyland," Victor Herbert's delightful extravaganze, will be presented for the last time at the American Theatre this Saturday afternoon and evening and at the matinee Sunday "Marying Mary," Edwin Milton Royle's latest musical play, with Florence Gear in the stellar role, will begin an engagement limited to one week. "Fun' is the keynote of "Marrying Mary," and riotous, hilarious fun it is most of the time. The situations are ludicrous, the dialogue bristles with humor and the characters are to be but seen to be laughed at. Imagine a young and pretty woman of the world, exquisite in every detail of dress and manner, calmly telling her lover that she has been married before—"a little" and then introducing him to a United States Senator, a Morman Bishop and a young man about town as her three ex-husbands, her lover occupying the position of Vice-President of the Anti-Divorce League! Imagine her further, in her first scene with the young man, asking him to loan her money, $100 the very favor he of the league was about to ask of his divinity, who is a supposititious heiress. Imagine the entrance upon the scene of the rector of the fashionables of Newport, who is willing to put up with the necessary scandal attendant upon marrying a divorced woman, to be able to call the charming Mary the wife of his clerical bosom. And also imagine the entree of the father of the young lover, coming to pay his son's debts and to drag him away from the seductive wiles of the "impostor," imagine this father falling in love with the imposter and determining to win him away from the infatuated son. To add to the hilarity, each of the three ex-husbands demands the lady as his own, claiming that the divorce was not properly granted. Here then is one lone woman claimed by six men, each ready to do and dare for her all that may be demanded of her protector. The music written by Silvio Hein for "Marrying Mary" is particularly melodic and singable. The chief songs are in the best of hands and will be sung by Miss Gear, who has an effective stage presence, a great deal of personal magnetism and an individuality and temperament that arrest and compel attention. The scenic investiture, and indeed, the entire production, are said to be more than lavish.

The David Bispham Concerts

David Bispham, the greatest of American vocal artists and one of the finest interpreters of song that the world of music possesses will make his appearance a week from Tuesday. He will give but two concerts in this city the dates being Tuesday night, March 16th, and Sunday afternoon, March 21th. At the first concert he will give a program which he has divided into four parts as follows: First, "Old Masterpieces"; second, "Songs by Classical Composers"; third, "Operatic Songs"; fourth, "Modern Songs." At the Sunday matinee the 21st, he will sing a program of works by Beethoven, Schubert, Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss Franz and others and a group of old Irish, Welsh, Scotch and English numbers. The concerts will be given at Christian Science Hall. Seats will be ready next Thursday at Sherman Clay & Co.'s, where the complete programs may be obtained.

JOSEF LHEVINNE.

"Under The Red Robe"

The last performances of "The Fatal Card," that highly interesting comedy-melodrama," will be given at the Valencia Theatre this Sunday afternoon and evening and on Monday night the celebrated romantic drama, "Under the Red Robe," adapted by Edward Rose from the novel by Stanley J. Weyman and presented for three hundred nights at the Empire Theatre, New York City, will be produced on a sumptuous scale. The play deals with that period in French history when the "Red Robe," otherwise Cardinal Richelieu, was supreme, and tells of the adventures of Gil de Berault, a gambler and bravo who is condemned to death for duelling. Richelieu spares his life on the condition that he become a spy and effect the arrest of a noble young rebel, Henri de Cocheforet, who is hiding in his chateau in the south of France. With reluctance he takes up his duty and soon gains the friendship and trust of the refugee and his beautiful sister, Renee, with whom he falls in love. He is compelled to make the arrest under circumstances over which he has no control and on his way back to Paris allows his prisoner to escape and proceeds alone to the Cardinal. He finds Richelieu downcast and deserted and the pretty romance ends with de Berault's pardon and his happy union with Renee. Miss Blanche Stoddard, the leading lady of the Valencia Stock Company, who has been taking a fortnight's well-earned rest, will reappear as Renee, a role created by Viola Allen and one that Miss Stoddard has played with great success. Mace Greenleaf will have a splendid part as de Berault, played originally by William Faversham, and Darrell Standing, who has scored so heavily as Marrable in "The Fatal Card," will be seen at his best as Richelieu. Thomas MacLarnie will be de Cocheforet, the young rebel, and Reginald Travers will reappear as the Marquis de Pombal, a young nobleman. Charles Dow Clark will have another chance to display his versatility as Clon, a deaf and dumb servant, and Robert Homans, Gerald Harcourt, Thomas Lowell and William Wolbert will have the remaining important male characters. Beatrice Nichols will be Mme. de Cocheforet, Lillian Andrews will have a splendid character role as Mme. Zaton, the mistress of the inn, and Peggy Monroe and Antoinette Crawford will play small but important parts. A small army of extra people will be in the production, which will in every respect be up to the high standard established by the Valencia Theatre Theatre managment. "Liberty Hall," R. C. Carton's beautiful comedy-drama, will follow "Under the Red Robe."

Real Indians at The Orpheum

"A Modern Pocahontas", an American incident realistically and picturesquely treated in which all the characters but two are full blooded Indians, will be the headline attraction at the Orpheum next week. Emma Rainey, a half bred Indian and a daughter of a famous Chief of the Shoshone Reservation, will be the star of the production. She is a graduate of Carlisle University and besides being an actress of great intensity and dramatic ability is the possessor of a very sweet soprano voice which has been most carefully cultivated. The Indians who appear in "A Modern Pocahontas" have been released from their reservation by permission of the United States Government and have been specially selected for their fitness for their respective roles. The story of the play has no claim to originality. George Smith, a cavalry officer, falls in love with Pocahontas, daughter of Tagaunee, an Indian Chief, and endeavors to persuade her to become his wife and to go with him to the home of his people. Their love making is discovered and Smith is made captive, tied to a stake and instructed to make his peace with the Great Spirit. Pocahontas, after the manner of her great namesake intercedes so eloquently with her vindictive parent that he changes his mind just as the fire brand is about to be applied to the faggots piled knee high about her lover. Smith is released and the pair are permitted to go unharmed. Incidental to the play aboriginal war dancing, smoking the pipe of peace and other ceremonials peculiar to the Indian race are indulged in. The Six Little Girls and a Teddy Bear, a particularly novel and entertaining act combining singing, dancing and comedy will be presented for the first time here. The dancing is furnished by a sextette of girls who have been identified with several of the most successful Broadway productions as special features. Everett Scott, the favorite Lilliputian so famous for his portrayal of animals is the comedian of the company and appears as a Teddy Bear with most amusing results. The Kitabanzai Troupe composed of eight marvelously clever acrobats and equilibrists, are included in the coming program. They were specially imported from Japan, for the Orpheum Circuit and the effect of their performance is heightened by most picturesque and beautiful stage settings. G. Herbert Mitchell, a capital baritone and an amusing and fluent raconteur, will make a bid for popular approval. Next week will conclude the engagement of Bowers Walter and Crocker, Agnes Mahr, Connelly and Webb and of Harry Foy and Florence Clark. A new series of particularly interesting Motion Pictures will terminate the performance.

"Walls of Jericho" at Ye Liberty

Manager Bishop has an attractive offering in store for his patrons at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, next week, in "The Walls of Jericho," Alfred Sutro's splendid drama. This is the piece that James K. Hackett and Mary Mannering brought out originally in New York City, and which was afterwards used as a joint starring vehicle by Herbert Kelcy and Effie Shannon. Oakland saw the Kelcy-Shannon production of the play for one or two nights only, so it will be practically new to theatre-goers across the bay. "The Walls of Jericho" has many commendable qualities that make it an excellent play for a stock company's use. The story, dealing as it does with the decadence of the English "smart set," is one of vital heart interest, told in an interesting manner amidst pleasant scenes. The characters are all finely drawn, and there is unlimited opportunities offered for the display of same handsome stage settings.

Landers Stevens and Georgie Cooper make their reappearance in "The Walls of Jericho" after an extended Eastern trip, and with Isabelle Fletcher, Helene Lackaye, Lillian Elliott, Estelle Warfield, George Friend, Henry Shumer, E. L. Bennison, George Webster and Robert Harrison make us a very strong cast. The scenery and stage garniture provided for this production will be adequate in every respect. George Ade's "College Widow" is in preparation to follow.

In the Limelight.

The final performance of "The Red Mill" will be given at the Van Ness Theatre on Sunday night. The Victor Herbert-Henry Blossom musical comedy is a most attractive performance.

Suzette Jackson, one of the girls in Clyde Fitch's "Girls", next week at the Van Ness Theatre, was for four years, leading ingenue with Nat. C. Goodwin. Ethel Grey Terry, another of the "Girls" cast made her debut on the stage with James Herne when she was three months old.

Owing to the limited engagements to be played at the Van Ness Theatre by "Girls", Lillian Russell and "The Right of Way", matinees are to be given Wednesdays and Saturdays. Seven nights and two matinees of each attraction will be offered.

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

We will also start a query column, in which the reader may ask questions pertaining to dress. Such questions will be answered in the following issue.

FANCY WAISTCOATS.

Fancy waistcoats are always much worn during the spring and summer months and will be more so this season owing to the returning popularity of blue serge suits and grey fabrics, which are always sure signs of a big demand for waistcoats. Particular attention should be paid in the selection of a waist coat, to the material, which should be always of good quality whether in an imported flannel or wash fabric. Noisy and conspicuous patterns should be avoided as a waistcoat is worn simply to tone up a suit which either a neat stripe or diagonal effect will accomplish.

In regard to cut and style the illustration above will be better than a description. It is a model of a single breasted waistcoat with collar which is correct style for morning wear, however, the same model without a collar wil be much more popular for general wear. You will notice the absence of oddly cut flaps or any oddities in this waistcoat, and being rich and not gaudy will no doubt appeal to a gentlemen's taste.

In scarfs, novelties are beginning to show up. There is the "Rep", a diagonal piece of silk with much lustre, which heretofore has been made only in plain colors, and without designs which one will find this season with interwoven stripe or dotted effects which are in different colors from the back ground, but in harmony with it. Then there is a new knitted tie different from any shown before, which promises to be very popular this season. This tie is always made up in a French four-in-hand. The folded four-in-hand shape of which a design is shown on this page, promises to be the most popular shape owing to the continuel popularity of the lap-over collar with its lock front.

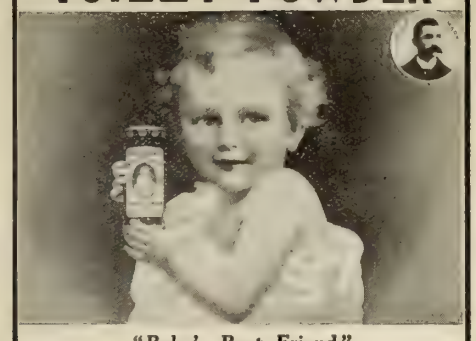
the detectives or cub reporters have suggested that the pearls might at this moment be on their way to some foreign pearl market. A thief as clever as this one appears to be would not be so foolish as to sell or attempt to sell the jewels to a local "fence."

Moreover, he would try to get as much money as possible for the loot. One of the newspapers placed the value of the Crocker pearls at $50,000, but the others appraised them at only $35,000. It is not expected that the cub reporter shall be familiar enough with pearls of great price to name that price with any degree of accuracy, and that lack of expert knowledge will easily account for the discrepancy of $15,000 in the newspaper reports. Which brings us to the nub of this phase of the mystery; namely, that whatever may have been the first cost of the pearls or their present appraised value by the cub reporters, they are worth more in the jewel market "on the string" than they are as separate pearls; the "matching" and "contrasting" of a string of pearls serving to enhance the value of the jewels in a ratio definitely determined by the dealers in such things.

In this subdivision of my analysis I assume that the thief is a man, that he is a clever man, that he is determined to be well paid for his crime, and that he will either hold the pearls for ransom at about one-third of their actual value "on the string," or dispose of them in a foreign market in their most valuable form, which, of course, as I have said before is "on the string."

If the pearls are worth $50,000 their ransom price will be in the neighborhood of $12,000 or $15,000; if they are worth only $35,000 they can be ransomed for approximately $10,000. I see that a reward of $2,500 has been offered for the return of the "string" and "no questions asked." This appraisement fixes the actual value of the pearls at about only $10,000. If the actual value of the pearls is more than $10,000 a reward of $2,500 will not retrieve them, and the "string" will eventually be offered in Bombay or Shanghai or Singapore or London where the market price of pearls "on the string" stolen in some other part of the world is one-third of the retail price in the marts of honest commerce.

I have not attempted to "deduce" that Miss Crocker's pearls may have been mislaid. Neither Mr. Holmes nor myself entertain any such absurd notion. In truth we both scout the suggestion as one unworthy of our subtle intellects. Neither will we accept the Laura Jean Libby idea that the missing string was a paste imitation of the real thing safety locked in the deposit boxes of the Crocker-Woolworth bank. But if it were a London duchess that had been bereaved of her precious pearls both Mr. Holmes and myself would have considered the possibility of an escrow deposit at a rich jewel shop or in some bank as collateral for coin needed to defray the expense of a season at baccarat. A London duchess would have been capable of this deception practiced upon her husband and the public. Both Mr. Holmes and myself have worked on cases of this kind, wherein the lady had pawned her jewels and substituted paste which were subsequently stolen by a thief who wouldn't know a real pearl from a pearl button or be able to distinguish between a genuine diamond and a rhinestone. We could readily understand why a London duchess would make a hullaballoo over the loss of a string of paste pearls and rouse the entire detective force of the metropolis on the pretense of recovering the swag.



But we have no such suspicion in this case and we are not working along the lines of any such assinine "deduction." These were real pearls; they were actually stolen; and we are now on the track of them, carefully following all the clues heretofore mentioned in this dossier of the "Crocker Pearl Robbery" as we intend to call it when Dr. Watson writes it up for the magazines and syndicates.

The new '09 Buick 40-horse-power touring car has made some wonderful records during the past week. On the 21st inst., in New Orleans this machine, with Burnam driving, broke the 50-mile world's record, the hour world's record, and the 100-mile world's record without a stop, making the 100 miles in the fast time of 1:42. The former 100-mile record, which was in 1:53, had stood for four years. In breaking this record the Buick defeated a number of the fastest and highest-powered racing cars in the country, both foreign and American. On top of this great victory, the same type of car driven by Frank Murray in the Altadena hill climb on Washington's Birthday broke the record over this course for touring cars carrying five passengers. It made faster time than any other touring car entered, although a good many of them were much higher powered machines and double the price of the Buick. Since these records have been made the Howard Automobile Company have been busier than ever demonstrating and taking orders on this 40-horse-power car.

Auto Notes

At the meeting held recently by the electrical automobile men of this coast at the St. Francis Hotel a permanent organization was formed to be known as the Pacific Coast Electrical Vehicle Association. R. B. Daggett was elected president; A. C. Downing of the Studebaker Automobile Company, vice-president, and A. H. Halloran, secretary-treasurer. The next meeting of the association will be held in Oakland in 1910.

Thirty-nine victories in six months is the remarkable record made by the Chalmers-Detroit cars, during the latter part of last season. The victories, fifteen of which are credited to the famous 30-horse-power car, represent all sorts of tests on the road, hill and track. Beginning with the Detroit Sealed Bonnet run, June 27th, the victories continue through the fall to the Riverside Hill Climb, December 5th. Both the Election Sweepstakes in which over one hundred Chalmers-Detroit cars made perfect scores, the famous one hundred days continuous running of two hundred miles a day are included in the records. New York, Maryland, Washington, Massachusetts, Atlanta, Georgia, Texas, California, Kansas, Long Island and Wisconsin, are a few of the states in which the power and quality of the Chalmers-Detroit cars have been proved. In a neat little folder, the Chalmers-Detroit factory gives the details of these victories.

Chas. S. Howard thinks the Buick "White Streak" was not given a very good deal in the Pasadena-Altadena hill climb. He claims that through some fault in the timing system in that hill climb the Buick streak had a minute added to its time. The little car in trials was going over the course in from 2:42 to 2:47. In the first event that was run off the time of the little car was given out as being 3:45. In two other events in which the same machine started it made 2:42 in one event and 2:47½ in another, and it certainly traveled as fast in the first as in either of the other two, which is pretty good proof that there was something wrong in the timing; and Howard thinks that the least that could have been done under the circumstances was to have given the machine another trial.

W. J. Richardson, who for ten years has been connected with one of the largest piano houses of San Francisco, has retired from the piano business and joined the sales forces of the Studebaker Bros.'s Company of California under John H. Fagal, manager of the automobile department of the Studebaker firm.

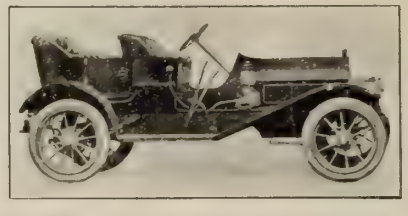
H. O. Harrison, agent in Southern California for the Oldsmobile, arrived in the city yesterday and will spend a few days visiting the members of the local trade. The Los Angeles motorist reports fine business in the automobile line throughout the southern part of the state and says that the dealers will undoubtedly sell all the cars they can get from the east. While in the city Harrison will make his headquarters at the Pioneer Automobile Company, local distributors of the Oldsmobile, Thomas and Chalmers-Detroit.

"While I expect to see a healthy and steady growth in demand for the high-priced cars, the automobile industry finds its greatest promise of permanency in the moderate-priced car," says Chester N. Weaver, manager of the local branch of the Studebaker Bros.'s Company of California. "Few, even of those whose optimism was an established condition before the automobile was generally accepted seriously could have dreamed four years ago that there could develop the tremendous demand that now exists for cars selling from $1,000 to $1,500. This demand, increasing as it has from year to year, always keeping ahead of the supply, now amounts to 50,000 cars per year—the United States will actually absorb that number of cars of the family touring and roadster types in the next six months. I base these figures upon the tremendous orders we have received for our Studebaker E-M-F "30" car. The large number of sales we have made recently of models "A" and "B" Studebaker-Garford cars is also a good indication of a growing popularity for the high-priced machines."

Yesterday the Howard Automobile Company reported sales of the Buick "White Streak" to the following: Carl Christenson of Oakland, Howard Hickman of this city, O. H. Bullene of Salinas, A. L. Salbach of Stockton, Dr. Gerald Fitzgibbon of this city, Summer Crosby of Alameda, and W. A. Larkin of this city

A leading New York City daily in speaking editorially of the present state of the automobile industry and the development of the machine itself calls particular attention to he famous run made by he Studebaker "army dispatch car," describing the event as one of "automobile history." Following a brief summary of the New York-to-Paris race, the editorial reads: "In its way the dash of the little Studebaker car from New York to Fort Leavenworth, Kans., was almost as notable. It left this city six days after the New York-to-Paris racers and beat them into Chicago, but, this was because the drivers were changed frequently and speed was the only consideration. Nevertheless its flight through the Western snow fields made automobile history. The distance of nearly 2,000 miles was covered in a little less than two weeks." Local automobile men are watching with considerable interest the coming arrival of this car on the Pacific coast which is scheduled to take place in the very near future.

No automobile salesroom west of Chicago represents as much of a motor car exhibition as the Pioneer Automobile Company. The models of the Chalmers-Detroits Oldsmobile and Thomas cars numbering forty different designs and styles are on exhibition. Every type from the big, racy six-cylinder 70-horse-power Thomas Flyer, to the famous 22-horse-power Baby Oldsmobile is shown, including the chasis of the famous Chalmers-Detroit "30". The warerooms represent a real automobile show, and are crowded every day by prospective motor purchasers.



The Pioneer Automobile Company received word yesterday to the effect that the 40-horse-power Chalmers-Detroit driven by Bert Dingley and a 4-cylinder 60-horse-power Thomas Flyer, captured their respective events in the Altadena-Pasadena Hill Climb at Los Angeles on Washington's Birthday. The time of the Thomas, being as it was a fully equipped touring car, was the remarkable feature of the day. Dingley ran away from all of his competitors with the Chalmers-Detroit.

Letters

Another Phillpotts's Novel

A new novel by Eden Phillpotts is always reckoned as a special literary event. "The Three Brothers," though less sombre than most of the tales of this author, has none the less its full share of tragedy. The scene, almost as a matter of course, is Dartmoor, and the hills and vales, the woods and streams with their changing aspects, enter as intimately into the narrative as do the human character. If one looks for a complete and rounded story of two lives interwoven with a minor chorus of neighbors and relatives then "The Three Brothers" lacks plot, but regarded as a cross section of the life of a community in which the Baskerville trio are men of mark, it is enimently satisfactory. Vivian Baskerville, the eldest of the three, was a farmer, the father of six children, prosperous and popular. In the main he was honorable and fair minded, but obstinate. His eldest son was the pride of his heart, and though Ned was idle, shiftless and incompetent, in the paternal eye he could do no wrong. He was credited with great mental capacity on no other evidence than that he was too pleasure loving to do his fair share of farm work. Rupert, the second son, was really his father's mainstay, sensible, strong and industrious but unappreciated and thwarted in his every desire as much as Ned was indulged and honored. When at length he left the farm to work elsewhere for himself, Vivian, vain of his great strength and ability in performing some utterly unnecessary task, fatally unjured himself, and blaming Rupert for the accident disinherited him. Nathan Baskerville, the youngest of the three, was a childless widower, keeper of a public house in the village, owner of considerable property and reckoned a man of wealth. He was popular with every class, the adviser of old and young, and trusted by everyone. He was the trustee of his brother Vivian's estate, and the villagers gave him their savings to invest, never thinking of bond or security. It was Nathan Baskerville who found work for the unemployed and seconded, if he did not propose, every project of interest. Of all the community there was but one who did not put him first and that one was the third brother, Humphrey Baskerville. Humphrey was as much disliked and distrusted as Nathan was beloved. He, too, was a widower with one grown son, Mark, an old man with a sharp, shrewd tongue, a student of nature and her ways, a philosopher whose secretive disposition and unlovely exterior led to his being misunderstood and whose pride stood in the way of his making effort to seek popularity. He was the exact antithesis of his brother Nathan and is the pivotal character around whom events focus. For in couse of time it devolpes that Humphrey Baskerville is in truth all that Nathan was believed to be. At his death it is discovered that instead of being a village Croesus he is utterly bankrupt. As trustee of his brother's estate he had thrown good money after bad in wild and unprofitable speculation and the people who had entrusted him with their hard gathered shillings and pounds could recover nothing from his empty coffers, while, though legally a widower since to have remarried would have obliged him to forfeit a comfortable legacy from his wife's estate he yet had an unacknowledged family. Humphrey Baskerville, accounted a miser, cold, indifferent and uncharitable, secretly and anoymously, took up the obligations unfulfilled. The same blindness with which Vivian Baskerville regarded his son Ned afflicted Nathan with regard to his unacknowledged daughter Cora, a cold, heartless, calculating beauty bent on making the best bargain for herself. It is not often that Mr. Phillpotts metes out what used to be called "poetic justice" but when Cora Lintern having first driven kindly, lovable Mark Baskerville to suicide, and thrown Ned over when she found it was to be all Ned and not Ned plus money, is herself cast aside by Timothy Waite, no one can feel otherwise than that she had received her deserts. No doubt there are narrow moralists who will agree with Eliza Gollop that Mrs. Lintern and her son Heathman should have been, at the very least, made the text of a denunciatory sermon, instead of being left unmolested and accepted on the same terms as before their story became public, but after all it is character that determines the course of action and the woman whose past life speaks for her essential integrity needs no trumpet blast to demand recognition of her honesty. As a relief from the sombre and tragic scenes in the history of the Baskervilles we have some inimitably humorous occurrences. There is Jack Head, radical and socialist, ready at all times to argue on his new ideas, but whose socialistic principles come out a poor second best, when his own thirty-five pounds are swallowed up in the bankruptcy of Nathan Baskerville's estate. Thomas Gollop, the parish clerk and sexton, and his colleague, Joe Voysey, the vicarage gardener, are a pair of antiquated worthies, stubborn, obstinate and opinionated, who hold on to their respective offices and defy the vicar to introduce innovations by the sheer force of their inertia. They stand together through thick and thin. As to what the new vicar, Dennis Masterman, had to expect, he having come in after the last incumbent had dozed for fifty-two years in the parish. "He've got a sister," said Voysey. "I hope she ain't one of the gardening sort, so-called, that's always messing round, making work and finding things blowed down here or eaten with varments there. If she's a flower-liking female, it will be my place to tell her straight out from the shoulder that flowers won't grow in the vicarage garden." Nor were Gollop and his sister, the redoubtable Eliza—official gossip as well as nurse, pew opener and busy body in general, a bit behind Voysey in making their attitude known. Thomas Hardy, who is literary god-father of Eden Phillpotts, says, and oddly enough, too, in speaking of the same subject, the Christmas mumming, that the earmark by which one may infallibly judge whether any custom is a survival of a revival, is the amount of enthusiasm in which it is pursued. The survival will be perfuctory and unenthusiastic while the revival will be infused with life and enlivened with arguments and discussions. The new vicar of Shaugh Prior, bent on the re-establishment of old usage, began in midsummer to prepare for a presentation of the old rustic play of King George and the Dragon, and a more humorous and realistic description of the rehearsal for the event, and of the final outcome of the laborous preparation it would be difficult to find any where. Jack Head's conception of the possibilities of his part as the Bear would have been the despair of a more experienced stage manager than Reverend Masterman and the star or stars had ample justification for demanding that he curtail his "business." It is claimed for Mr. Phillpotts that the people of Dartmoor make no objection to the manner in which he presents them, but regard him as a sympathetic and understanding comrade. He certainly gives them to the reading world as living and human, and their joys and their sorrows, their tragedies and comedies make a lasting impression. Published by the Macmillan Company.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Bruno—No, the Examiner is not in sympathy with injustice. It has changed its policy under a misapprehension of the state of the public mind. Incidentally it is afraid to offend the Call and the Bulletin. Yes the Chronicle is publishing the news. That is why you see so many Chronicles in the street cars nowadays.

Litigant—No Town Talk is not opposed to Grove Johnson's bill. We think Mr. Johnson is right. There is no reason why a man who has been libeled by a newspaper should be barred from bringing suit until he puts up a bond. The newspapers made the law. The people, however, seem to be in favor of newspaper legislation.

Country Cousin—I do not believe that Miss Crocker has any intention of going on the stage. The prevailing impression is that she lost the pearls in good faith.

Pessimist—No, Mr. Spreckels has not lost interest in the civic uplift. He probably thinks it advisable to abate temporarily the issue of which he appears to be the body, soul and breeches.

Country Subscriber—Yes, the San Francisco dailies make San Francisco's sentiment. That's why it is what it is.

Sceptic—Yes, Professor Boke was admitted to practice, but he doesn't for obvious reasons.

Hetch-Hetchy—Yes, he is a great engineer. He has been engineering himself into public jobs for a quarter of a century.

SONG

Lightly we met in the morn,
Lightly we parted at eve.
There was never a thought of the thorn
The rose of a day might leave.

Fate's finger we did not perceive,
So lightly we met in the morn!
So lightly we parted at eve
We knew not that love was born.

I rose on the morrow forlorn,
To pine and remember and grieve.
Too lightly we met in the morn!
Too lightly we parted at eve;

Reformed Into Adversity

Theodore P. Shonts, a railroad magnate, has been expounding the relations between the transportation business and the industrial interests of this once prosperous land. Mr. Shonts is of the opinion that a knowledge of these relations is essential to an understanding of what the matter is with this country. He explains that the resources of the country cannot be developed without adequate railroad facilities, and that the present industrial depression is in a measure due to lack of these facilities and in a measure to the stifling of railroad enterprise. To make this explanation clear he points out that a little over a year ago the railroads in seeking to meet the demand for facilities were spending $1,200,000,000 for supplies, and now they are spending less than $500,000,000. As a consequence many thousands of men have been thrown out of employment in forests, mines, and factories, and one-fourth of the men who were employed by the railroads fifteen months ago are now idle. What has been the cause of this great shrinkage of labor? Mr. Shonts is of the opinion that it is entirely the result of politics. He says that political pigmies have taken the heart out of railroad corporations and chilled the laudable ambition of railroad managers. "Improvements involving hundreds of millions," says Mr. Shonts, "have been abandoned because of the vengeful spirit that has temporarily possessed the minds of men whose duty it is carefully to consider proposed legislation." Incidentally, Mr. Shonts predicts that until the railroads receive fair treatment prosperity will not return to this country. He would not have it understood that he is opposed to supervision or regulation by commission. He admits that the railroads have not been more virtuous than other corporations; that railroad magnates have been as selfish as other men, and that they should be under legitimate restraint; but he objects to having politicians empowered to do politics at the expense of the railroads. There should be no rate discrimination, says Mr. Shonts; the public should be protected; but the physical operation of railroads should not be placed in the hands of professional politicians. All that Mr. Shonts has said on this subject every intelligent man knows to be true. It was the policy of the recent Administration at Washington to prove to the dear people that certain eminent statesmen were not in sympathy with rich and powerful railroad magnates, and to that end it was deemed expedient to curb the money-making propensities of these voracious captains of industry. This peculiar policy was apropos of nothing in particular; the whole country was enjoying an era of unprecedented prosperity; the rich were growing richer and the poor were becoming scarcer. Certain abuses existed, the natural result of new conditions which human foresight could not have provided against, but there was no rational occasion for friction between classes, such as has been engendered in older countries between the nobility and the downtrodden and miserable multitude. Nevertheless, dissatisfaction was stirred up, hatreds were manufactured, and under pretense of awakening the civic conscience, demagogues and muckrakers in every State in the land received endorsement from Washington, and on the strength of certificates of character from headquarters they proceeded to tear down and destroy, leaving a wide swath of destruction in their wake as they stormed the straw citadels of corruption and iniquity. Fortunately, the reaction has come and under a new and benign Administration the work of repair has been started. President Taft has announced that he is in favor of exempting the railroads from the Sherman anti-trust law in order that they may be empowered to make joint rates and enter into pooling arrangements. Two years ago if any statesman had suggested such a proposition he would have been denounced by the idol of the people as the tool of malefactors of great wealth.

Roosevelt's Future

Ex-President (praise to the immortal gods for that "ex") Roosevelt says, "I step back into the ranks, but I do not quit the army." This may be interpreted to mean that he retires perforce of circumstances; that he would have joyed to prolong his "corking time"; but in deference to tradition and an uncertain public opinion he returns to the ranks, hoping for promotion and final reinstatement four years hence. It will be remembered that President Roosevelt in that famous pronunciamento putting aside the proffered third-term crown did not say he would never again be a candidate for the presidency; he merely declined the nomination on that occasion. Unless all signs fail he has merely retired temporarily behind the throne. Mr. Taft was the nominee of President Roosevelt, and it is plausible to infer that President Roosevelt chose Mr. Taft as his successor because he thought the creature of his nomination policy would remain his creature until it should suit the pleasure of the creator to resume business at the old stand. Having provided a stop-gap, he could take a few days off and go a-hunting in Africa, returning to hob-nob with the crowned heads of Europe, and after learning the ways of royalty get back to his own country in time to fix things up for another rise from the ranks. But suppose Mr. Taft should take a notion to be President again himself; suppose he should begin to inaugurate a few policies of his own; what if he should repudiate the man that put him in the seat of the mighty? Where will Teddy get on? Most of us have read of Frankenstein and his monster, and we know that the creature sometimes revolts against the creator. It is all very well for Mr. Taft to compare Roosevelt with Washington and Lincoln in absurd and fulsome panegyric, but none of us believe that Mr. Taft is in any degree hypnotized by the man with whom he has so long associated. Roosevelt may have hypnotized all the hero-worshiping fools in the nation, but he has not fooled Bill Taft. Once firmly seated in the presidential saddle Taft will probably ride his own gait, irrespective of the protests of the man that put his feet in the stirrups. If this is not the ultimate result of a Taft administration, heaven preserve the country from Roosevelt and a dictatorship that will speedily merge into a monarchy! Caesar was the ancient prototype of Roosevelt and Diaz is his contemporary.

The Bludgeoning of Watterson

In polemical debate, when you have exhausted your syllogisms without refuting your antagonist, there is still available one expedient by which you may close the argument and become master of the field. This expedient is a club by the dexterous use of which you may knock your antagonist down. This is sometimes called the argumentum baculinum. We have been reminded of this dernier ressort in dialectics by the treatment which Colonel Henry Watterson of Kentucky has received at the hands of certain learned and refined gentlemen of this city, who have consecrated themselves to the cause of good morals and to the uplift of society. Colonel Watterson was temerarious enough not long ago, in discussing the case of Patrick Calhoun, to suggest that the people of this northern city were not giving a certain gentleman from the South a square deal. Needless to say Colonel Watterson stirred up the animals in this neck of the woods. There was immediately a stiffening of the sinews and a summoning up of the blood; a rattling of typewriters and a volley of "open letters" loaded with invective and pregnant with destruction. The minatory shriek of the polemic was heard in the land, and the urbane Kentucky editor was hurled from the acclivity of his self-complacency—

To grinning scorn a sacrifice, and endless infamy!

Prior to this unfortunate affair we supposed that all good men venerated Colonel Henry Watterson. It had never occurred to us for a moment that the Louisville journalist, in his professional capacity, was animated by wicked and unworthy motives. We were laboring under the delusion that this illustrious journalist of the old school, this aggressive veteran of the hustings and the tripod, had an indefeasible claim on the civility of all controversialists. We are now conscious of our error. The Colonel is entitled to no better treatment than the meanest of his contemporaries. The hint has been broached that perhaps Patrick Calhoun is interested in the traction system of Louisville and that the Courier-Journal is under subsidy. Has Colonel Watterson been found out? It will not astonish us to learn that the invidious imputation hurled against the Colonel is well-founded. As a seducer of the press Patrick Calhoun is irresistible. The Call and Bulletin are the only papers that he cannot debauch.

The Penalty of Obtrusion

As it is impossible for all of us to think alike, it seems ridiculous to be angry with a man because he is not of our opinion. Our individual judgments are contracted, uncertain, warped by prejudices, and the more profoundly we delve into the complex problems of life the more familiar we become with the unreliability of our decisions. But the world is full of dogmatists, and it is not unusual for men of good sense to become intolerant of the opinions of others, nor to be truculent in their devotion to prejudice while persuading themselves that they are adhering to truth. In the circumstances we do not feel called upon to formulate apologies on behalf of the frenetic patriots who employed the argumentum baculinum in refutation of the Kentucky journalist. For obtruding in a family quarrel he got what he might reasonably have expected if not what he deserved. He should not be shocked at the intemperate character of the retorts discourteous which he evoked. He should not even be astonished. He lives in a section of the country where the violence of prejudice frequently runs into lynchings and mob-law. But though for many generations Kentucky has been the hotbed of factions and feuds, it has never been distracted by a more embittered feud than the one that has raged in this city for two years. Every class in the community has been excited and maddened by it. Our pulpits have resounded with it, our newspapers have been filled with it; whenever it is discussed it leads to distempered expressions of feelings, and few are the partisans that have been able to restrain their ardor at judgment heat. San Francisco is even now a furnace of fiery, splenetic humors. We have been enacting here in a mitigated form, the blood being omitted, the scenes of terror that accompanied the French Revolution. In one respect we have been more lawless than the French; for while they were candidly revolutionary, frankly contemptuous of the laws of their country, we have hypocritically pretended to comply with the forms of law. For a revolution there may be justification, but for the subversion of the institutions of a country in the name of justice there cannot be palliation. In all the circumstances of the case should we not pardon Colonel Watterson for indulging the suspicion, howsoever groundless, that the man around whom the furious conflict rages is not getting a square deal. Perhaps the Colonel, accustomed as he is to scenes of turbulence, and knowing how rarely justice is done when passion and prejudice prevail, is at least justified in assuming that Patrick Calhoun is not in the full enjoyment of all his constitutional rights.

The Deal That He Is Getting

Patrick Calhoun may be getting a square deal in this city, but Colonel Watterson is not singular in thinking otherwise, a fact that is apparent to any one who has followed the examination of talesmen in Judge Lawlor's remarkable court. Apparently the views of a large percentage of the citizens of this city are in accord with those of the Kentucky journalist. But these citizens may be in error, and the gentlemen who have taken a club to Colonel Watterson may be correct. The difference of opinion is not necessarily the result of illogical reasoning. It may be the result of confusion respecting the principles of a square deal. In all probability the men who hold that Patrick Calhoun is getting a square deal would be willing to be similarly treated if charged with crime, whether innocent or guilty. However, it can hardly be assumed that they will insist that the treatment he has received is in strict or even in approximate accord with that which the Constitution and the statutes of the country prescribe. The probability is that, assuming Patrick Calhoun to be guilty, being incapable of conceiving his innocence of the crime charged (though, as every intelligent man knows, it is far from inconceivable), they conclude that whatever course is pursued in furtherance of justice is consistent with a square deal. The perpetration of injustice in the name of justice does not affect their sensibilities in the slightest degree. That men of this peculiar mental obliquity should be intolerant of Colonel Henry Watterson's views we are not at all surprised; nor does it amaze us that they should fail to appreciate the spirit of a man whose indignation is fired at seeing a whole community stand by and suffer one of its citizens to be subjected to what he regards as inhuman treatment. Let us briefly recall the salient features of the campaign against Calhoun, and then ask ourselves the question whether Colonel Watterson has any reason for thinking that he has not been treated with fairness. The first thing that occurs to our mind is that an American citizen is entitled to a speedy trial. Was Patrick Calhoun granted a speedy trial? For two years his attorneys clamored for a trial and they were put off from time to time, and even the statutory limitation was ignored as though none existed. In what way has this procrastination affected the case of Patrick Calhoun? During all the long period which has elapsed since his indictment his enemies, in preparation for the trial, have been engaged in the manufacture of hostile sentiment. Scarcely a day has passed without the propagation of some piece of scurrility in traduction of Calhoun by the men behind the graft prosecution. They have made him the object of class hatred, and they have pursued him with a vindictiveness so virulent and impassioned that it would be ridiculous to account for it on the principle of civic zeal or of an acute sense of righteousness. If they had not a hand in the conspiracy which precipitated the railroad strike immediately after his indictment, they at least availed themselves of that strike as a pretext for wholesale abuse and for inflaming against Calhoun the sentiment of organized labor. And though in the end a committee of organized labor acknowledged that it was an unjust strike the prosecution organs never had the decency to recant their malign misrepresentation. While there may be some doubt with respect to the extent to which the civic patriots inspired the Carmen's Union, which is to this day represented by its President in the municipal administration, there is hardly any room for doubt as to the source of the inspiration received by those puppets in public office who precipitated the dispute which has been kept fresh in mind by the horse-cars that are running on Market Street. This dispute has furnished an endless theme for comment calculated to prejudice the multitude against Calhoun. It is one of the adventitious aids to justice designed and executed by those zealous moralists who have been regenerating this wicked city, the same sincere and righteous gentlemen through whose ingenuity the League of Justice was organized. Upon this organization we must animadvert because it has been playing the part of a protagonist in the great melodrama. An excellent institution, we are told, including among its members many estimable ladies and gentlemen, but should there be any doubt of the spirit with which it is inspired or the purpose for which it exists. If the courts were in evil hands, if the police or any of the municipal authorities were in league with the higher-ups, then unquestionably it would be proper for the citizens to organize with a view to the stimulation of righteous public sentiment, but what is the obvious state of affairs? Is there any doubt that the men behind the graft prosecution are in control of the machinery of government? Is the District Attorney hostile to them? Is the judge on the bench unfriendly? There is no room for dubiety that we can discern with reference to the League of Justice. It is as much at the service of the graft prosecution as the Call and Bulletin. If it has any purpose other than that of influencing jurors against the man that Henry Watterson believes to be the victim of a cruel conspiracy, it has not been revealed. We have not heard of any protest from this League of Justice against the methods of the prosecution. Since the work of impaneling the jury was begun the kept organs of the prosecution, which are part of the machinery employed against Calhoun, have sought to influence the jurors by calumniation most cruel, and the League of Justice has not expressed its disapprobation. One of these shameless journals gave countenance to the inspired yarn of a convicted thief to the effect that a cell-mate had confessed that he was employed by a United Railroad detective to murder Jim Gallagher. The other journal charged Calhoun with having robbed his sister. This is a species of journalism which would not be tolerated in some American communities. The courts of Massachusetts, for example, take cognizance of newspapers that interfere with the course of justice. In this city, we have seen that it is only when a juror receives newspaper clippings through the mail that there is deemed occasion for investigation. Briefly we have reviewed some of the expedients which have been employed against Calhoun, and which Colonel Watterson had in mind when he discussed the case. We have yet to come into court, where so much is being said of assassination and other things equally pertinent. Under our system of justice prosecuting attorneys are employed to assist the courts in ascertaining the truth. They are judicial officers and are expected to be as unprejudiced and as impartial as the man on the bench. It is in violation of the letter and the spirit of the law, and a crime of the most despicable character, for a prosecuting attorney to attempt to compass the conviction of a man by perverting the law, distorting the evidence or exciting the prejudice of the jury. Consider the man who is prosecuting Patrick Calhoun; consider the motives that must actuate him in view of all that has occurred; that seem to actuate him in view of what is occurring, and ask yourself whether you would care to undergo prosecution at such hands, even though you were innocent of the crime with which you were charged. But the question of motive, we have been told, is of no consequence. The learned Professor Boke, who practices law on the students of Berkeley, affirms that it is tommyrot to talk of motive. The only question involved in all these graft cases, says Boke, is the question of guilt or innocence. If we regarded Professor Boke as competent to teach law in Berkeley, we should suspect him of insincerity as a publicist, for there seems to us nothing more obvious than that the question of motive is really the paramount question in this graft prosecution. Every defendant is entitled to a prosecution that is animated by no other motive than that of ascertaining the truth.

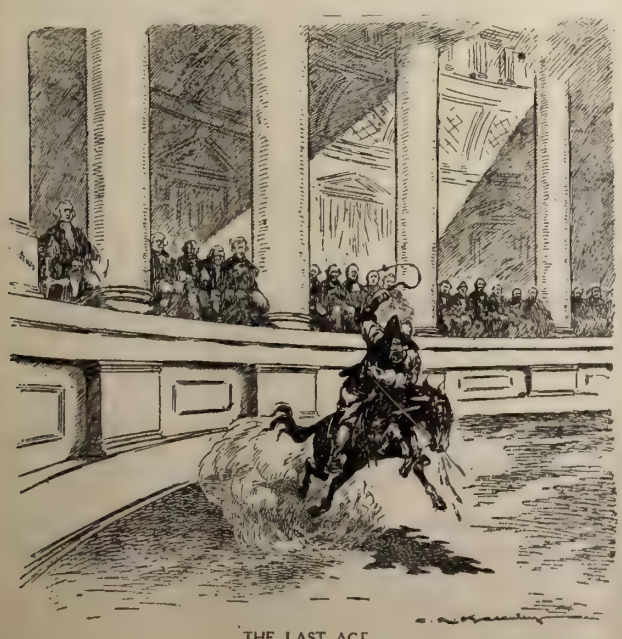
When any other motive enters into the prosecution the defendant is in danger of being defrauded of his rights. Whatever may be thought to have been the motives of the prosecutors at the beginning of their enterprise, there can hardly be any question as to what actuates them at this stage of developments. It is apparent now that they are almost as much on the defensive as the defendants themselves, and being on the defensive they are more aggressive than ever. They are now fighting tooth and nail in the hope of vindicating themselves and ruining the man who, should he ever be able to turn the tables, might succeed in landing some of them in the penitentiary. As the men animated by these motives are in control of the machinery of justice it ought to be obvious even to the purblind that the question of guilt or innocence is not the only question involved in this feud. Now admitting that the situation is such as we have feebly described, it should hardly be necessary to go further in to details to show that Patrick Calhoun, though he may be getting a square deal, is hardly getting what the Constitution guarantees him. However, let us continue the inquiry along these sames lines. A defendant, it will be admitted, is entitled to a trial before a judge free from sinister motive. Is Judge Lawlor actuated by none but the noblest of motives—that of ascertaining the truth? That is a question which Judge Lawlor's conscience alone can answer. That he believes himself to be actuated by no other motive we must assume, as he is not under compulsion in his capacity as trial judge. It is his privilege to pronounce himself disqualified, but though the defendant has challenged Judge Lawlor's impartiality, the learned judge has affirmed his own freedom from bias. Yet Judge Lawlor is to a certain extent part and parcel of the graft prosecution. This we do not say with the intention of discrediting him. It is not altogether his fault that he has been put on the defensive by men under indictment, nor that he has been involved in scandals growing out of the graft prosecution and identified with men connected with the prosecution. But the fact is that he has not been permitted to hold himself aloof in the clear atmosphere of a disinterested observer. The average man affected to the extent to which Judge Lawlor has been affected would find it extremely difficult to preside impartially over the trial of Patrick Calhoun. But Judge Lawlor, we must assume, is not fashioned of ordinary clay. Yet, to revert to the question of motive,—suppose that in the depths of his capacious heart Judge Lawlor felt that it was as much to his interest as to all the men behind the graft prosecution to keep Calhoun and others on the defensive for an indefinite period, to exhaust their resources so that they should be unable to rehabilitate themselves; in short, suppose that as a result of the things that have been done in the name of justice it was to the vital interest of certain men to triumph over Calhoun, and Judge Lawlor were in sympathy with their aims, would the question of motive be of no importance? Would Calhoun be considered to be in the enjoyment of all his rights and in no danger of being treated with injustice? These questions in connection with a discussion of the subject of a square deal are not immaterial and irrelevant, since they suggest certain principles of right conduct of paramount importance, and since, furthermore, they are the very questions which Colonel Henry Watterson may have propounded to himself before butting into our family quarrel.

Perspective Impressions



There is a woman in Boston who has embraced twenty-three religions. A case of spiritual fickleness.

According to Supervisor Giannini the city has been vouchsafed everything it wanted from the Federal authorities. Then the city must have wanted Congress to send Mr. Giannini back empty handed.

President Taft has already abandoned one of "My policies." The simplified speller has been thrown out of the White House.

The signs of the times indicate that the sporting editors have kindly consented to make it worth the while of Jim Jeffries and Jack Johnson to give an imitation of two men fighting for the world's championship.

When the Pittsburg grafters were uncovered a few months ago it was suggested that Mr. Heney should be employed to prosecute. The Pittsburg authorities felt that they were able to attend to the business in hand, and though they did not grant immunity to the lower-downs, they have already landed one of the higher-ups in the penitentiary.

The Old Order Changeth

Some of the Blessings that May Accrue from a Taft Administration, Contrasted with the Misfortunes that We were Compelled to Eudure While Oppressed by the Petulancies and Caprices of a Roosevelt Regime.

By Democritus

The Grin has gone, the Smile has arrived. Roosevelt is Out; Taft is In. The Gargoyle no longer leers from the outward wall; the mistletoe hangs in the White House hall. Peace reigns in Warsaw. All quiet along the Potomac.

Good riddance to the Teddy Bear; welcome to the wily, succulent 'possum. Farewell to the Big Stick: hail to the soft answer that turneth away wrath. Good-bye, Truculent Theodore: lift the latch for Sunny Bill.

There's silence in the tennis court; there's laughter on the golf links. The stable door's locked: the portals of the garage are wide open. The Ananias Club has adjourned sine die: the undesirable citizens and the malefactors of great wealth are swarming to hear Bill tell funny stories that begin with a laugh and end in a roar. All the nature fakirs are a-giggle with glee, for Bill is on deck and he is partial to stories of marvels by land and sea: he may not believe them, but he will not denounce those who relate them: he is a receptive vehicle for all good things, be they pregnant of wit or fat with the wisdom of the ages. And not only is he a receiver of these things, he is also a giver of good things. Bill may have his faults; no doubt he is as human as the rest of us; but they are not the faults that we have been compelled to endure for seven years—the evils that smote the Egyptians in the period of the lean kine. Then ho, for the stalled oxen and the years of abundance; the time of plenty and the fatness thereof.

Sound the loud timbrel o'er Afric's green sea; Roosevelt is gone and our people are free. Some of us don't care if he never comes back. What's Roosevelt to us? What are we to Roosevelt? The king is dead: long live the king. Let him go up embattled against the beasts of the jungle and the desert; he will never again, we hope and pray, go up embattled against his fellow countrymen. Let him thrust the pachydermatous hippopotamus with the spear that knows no brother; let him thwack the impervious rhinoceros athwart the mazzard of his stupid jowls with the Big Stick —never again shall we dodge and cringe before the threat of thrust or blow. Let him preach against race suicide to gibbering baboons and whiskered chimpanzees—blessed be the day when he ceased his meddling with our pride of ancestry and our hope of posterity.

This warrior who bestrode a palmetto fence on Kettle Hill while the colored troops fought nobly at San Juan will now wear khaki and carry a gun in the suburbs of Ujijji and Uganda to slaughter helpless lions and lumbering elephants to make a Roosevelt holiday. It is a congenial pastime for a mighty hunter that has stalked nobler game with spies of the Treasury Department and retorted upon protesting Senators with the sneer that their objection was father to the thought that the gumshoe men were trailing them to discover their misdeeds. Oh, a great hunter is Roosevelt—when the hunting is safe.

He has stepped back into the ranks, but he has not quit the army. Fortunately the army is big enough to contain him. As long as he is in the ranks he is harmless. He can whoop as loud as he likes; there will be others who can whoop louder than he. There need be none so poor that they need do him reverence. That some there will be who, because he was once President of the United States, will bow down before him and worship him we can well believe; but these will win only the contempt of their fellow citizens for their abjectness and their servility. Not all who live under the stars and stripes are members of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League.

It has been said that his successor is his puppet; that Big Bill Taft is a reincarnation of the Roosevelt policies. Let us hope for the honor of American manhood that this is not true. Let us rejoice to suffer the worst that Taft can inflict by his mistakes and his misjudgment as long as they are the errors of Taft and not the tyrannies of Roosevelt. What a thing of laughter we should be for the other nations if Big Bill Taft should be the marionette of Roosevelt! Yet Bill has already shown an inclination in that direction. He has said that the three greatest men this country has produced are Washington, Lincoln and Roosevelt. Nobody agrees with that comparison—not even the members of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League, for they have not named their hybrid organization the Roosevelt-Lincoln League, and they only wait until Big Bill shall make good, to drop Roosevelt and substitute Taft at the end of their hyphen; a good deal will depend on the number of offices the League receives under the Taft administration. They were not treated as well as they thought they deserved by the man they glorified with such fervor.

From our own side of the political arena we shout to Big Bill to cut off that pactolian stream flowing Heneyward from the Department of Justice, and we ask him to shut the doors of the secret service to our tailor-made detective, William J. Burns, when his pernicious activity shall have worked him out of his job in San Francisco. That is the only favor we shall ask of Bill. But on second thought, perhaps it will be just as well if the Department of Justice shall restore Heney to his old job of putting land thieves in jail instead of sending them to the penitentiary; and perhaps the ex-tailor would be better disposed in his old job of chasing counterfeiters at $150 a month. But for the preservation of the peace in this town, Bill, take these pestiferous citizens away from us. And your humble petitioners will ever pray.

Teddy is down and out; and Bill is on deck. No matter what Bill does to us, it cannot be worse than what Teddy has done. How are the mighty fallen! And how delighted we are to see him drop. We'll take our chances on his getting back. If he does return to the old place it will be our fault—not his. If necessary we'll elect Debs. Of two evils it is always better to choose the lesser.

Any way, a Smile is pleasanter on the face of the nation than the Grin we have been wearing during the past seven years. A Smile is genial and good natured; a Grin is sardonic and irritating. Things will probably go wrong even in the sunny presence of the Smile; but they will not be as bad as they would be if they were provoked by the Grin.

We are not afraid of being annoyed by Roosevelt's editorial utterances. We don't have to read the editorials. We did have to read the messages. And if they put him in the place of old Depew his speeches will not disturb us. We can ignore them or laugh at them without fear of being classed as undesirable citizens or risking sentence to the Ananias Club for lese majesty. Even the prestige that sometimes lends dignity to one who has been President of the United States will not attach to this one. He will be only Theodore Roosevelt, the man that disturbed the peace of the nation for seven long, weary years, exercising the power of his office to annoy other men who cannot be annoyed by a mere Roosevelt. No doubt his insufferable egotism will incite him to renewed endeavor in the old way, but it will only provoke our laughter—it cannot enforce our submission.

The Governor of Judaea

From the French of Anatole France, a disciple of Ernest Renan. In this story is indicated the place occupied by Jesus in the consciousness of a contemporary Roman, one who figured in the most memorable tragedy in the world's history. That the point of the story is not at variance with history is evident from the fact that Josephus who was a contemporary of Christ and who knew of everything that happened in the Palestine of his day makes no reference to the Crucifixion and fails to mention the Founder of Christianity. France has made himself familiar with the age of ferment when Christianity was struggling with paganism in the ancient mind, and with the manners and customs of the people of Rome in the days of the Caesars. By French critics he is regarded as the foremost literary artist of France. They compare him with Voltaire for his irony and with Renan for his style.—Editor's Note.

The fastest of a fast set, Aelius Lamia led a gay life in Rome until, becoming involved in a scandal with Lepida, the wife of Sulpicius Turinus, he was banished by Tiberius Cæsar. He was then in his twenty-fourth year. During the succeeding eighteen years he traveled in Syria and Palestine, and lingered in Jerusalem and Antioch. This exile terminated at the death of Tiberius. Thereafter he led a peaceful, quiet life. In his sixty-second year he went to the baths of Baiæ, which was then the resort of Rome's most fashionable set.

One day, wandering over the hills, he encountered a litter borne by slaves up a narrow path. He saw among its cushions a corpulent old man, leaning on his elbow, gazing around him with a sombre, haughty expression. At the first glance Lamia recognized the face, and springing toward the litter with an expression of pleasure, he exclaimed:

"Pontius Pilatus! The gods be praised that I am permitted to see you again."

The old man, motioning to his slaves to stop, bent a keen look upon the stranger who greeted him.

"Pontius, my dear host," the other continued, "twenty years have whitened my locks and hollowed my cheeks so much that you no longer recognize Aelius Lamia."

At the name Pontius descended from his litter as quickly as his age and corpulence permitted and twice embraced Aelius Lamia.

"Indeed it is a pleasure to see you again. Alas! You remind me of the days when I was governor of Judæa in the province of Syria. I first saw you thirty years ago at Cæsarea, where you went to drag out the weary days of exile. I was fortunate enough to shorten them a little and, for friendship's sake, Lamia, you followed me to that dreary Jerusalem, where the Jews filled me with bitterness and loathing. For nearly ten years you were my guest and companion and, conversing of imperial Rome, we found consolation, you for your misfortunes, I for my grandeur."

Lamia embraced him again.

"You don't tell all, Pontius; you do not mention that you used your credit with Herod Antipas in my favor and generously opened your purse to me."

"We will not speak of that," replied Pontius, "since after your return to Rome you repaid me with usury."

"I do not consider my debt discharged by the mere payment of money, Pontius. But tell me: have the gods fulfilled your wishes? Do you enjoy all the happiness you deserve? Tell me of your family, your fortune, your health."

"Having retired to Sicily, where I own estates, I cultivate and sell my wheat. My oldest daughter, my beloved Pontia, now a widow, lives with me and directs the affairs of my household. Thanks to the gods, I have retained the vigor of my intellect; my memory is not impaired. But old age does not come without a long train of pains and infirmities. I suffer cruelly from the gout, and you now see me on my way to seek relief for my suffering."

"May you find it, Pontius! But, spite of the gout and its pangs, you seem scarcely older than I, though in reality ten years my senior. In sooth, you have retained more vigor than I ever possessed, and I rejoice to see you so robust. Why have you renounced public office, why have you since leaving Judæa, resided on your estates in Sicily in voluntary exile?"

Pontius Pilate shook his head mournfully. "Natural energy and the feeling of duty led me to perform my public functions, not only with diligence but interest. Yet hate steadily pursued me. Intrigue and calumny have blasted my life and withered its fruits just as they were ripening. You know, Lamia, in what strict dependence I was held by the Pro-consul Vitellius, who, governing Syria not for Rome, but against her, regarded the provinces of the empire as farms given to the tetrarchs. The Samaritan leaders came weeping to him from pure hatred of me. According to their story, nothing was farther from their thoughts than to disobey Cæsar. I was a stirrer of strife and it was to resist my violence that they gathered around Tyrathaba. Vitellius listened to their complaints and, trusting the affairs of Judæa to his friend Marcellus, commanded me to go and justify myself to the emperor.

"I set sail with a heart full of grief and resentment. Just as I approached the shores of Italy, Tiberius, worn by age and the fatigues of empire, died suddenly on this very Cape Misenium which you see jutting into the evening mists.

"Vainly I sought justice from his successor, Caius, who was too young to apply to affairs a mind naturally quick and keen. I had no better success when I appealed to the Senate which, like all great public assemblies, cannot devote itself promptly and intelligently to private affairs. I was forced to remain under the shadow of unmerited disgrace. Devouring my tears, sustained by rancor, I retired to my estates in Sicily, where I should have died of grief had not my gentle Pontia come to console her father.

"I have cultivated wheat and raise the largest ears in the province. Now my career is ended. The future will judge between Vitellius and me."

"Pontius," replied Lamia, "I am convinced that you dealt with the Samaritans according to the uprightness of your nature and solely for the interest of Rome. But did you not, in this instance, too readily obey the inflexible courage which ever led you on? You know that in Judæa, when, as the younger, I should naturally have been more ardent, I often counseled clemency and gentleness."

"Gentleness to the Jews!" cried Pontius Pilate. "Though you have lived among them, you little know those enemies of the human race. The gods can bear witness that I was obstinate only in gentleness. What did these kindly intentions avail? You witnessed the outbreak of the first rebellion, in the beginning of my government, Lamia. Need I remind you of the circumstances? The garrison of Cæsarea had gone to take winter quarters in Jerusalem. The legions bore on their standards images of Cæsar. The sight offended the Hierosolymites, who do not recognize the divinity of the emperor, as if, since he must be obeyed, it were not more honorable to obey a god than a man. The priests of the nation came before my tribunal to implore me with haughty humility to have the images carried out of the Holy City. Through respect for the divinity of Cæsar and the majesty of the empire, I refused. Then the populace, joining the priests, uttered threatening supplications around the Prætorium. I ordered the soldiers to stack their pikes in the Antonia fortress, and armed with rods, like the lictors, disperse the insolent crowd. But, insensible to blows, the Jews still besought me, and the most obstinate, throwing themselves prostrate on the ground, died under the scourging without offering the least resistance. You witnessed my humiliation, Lamia.

The World's Most Beautiful Exposition

That is What the People of Seattle are Preparing to Give and They are Almost Ready.

The Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition, to be held in Seattle from June 1st to October 16th, is to surpass all the world's fairs in the history of this country in the matter of sheer beauty. This is the boast of the managers of the exposition and there is no danger of its proving extravagant. One of the chief features of this exposition will be the natural scenery. Of this the landscape artists who have had charge of the laying out of the exposition grounds have taken full advantage, and the formal and sunken gardens and lawns which they have planted are so arranged as to lose themselves in the groves of native evergreens which surround the grounds, while above and beyond them arise the mountains, perpetually snowclad, Rainier, the highest peak in the United States proper, the Selkirks and the Olympics, framing in the picture.

Puget Sound, on the shores of which Seattle is built, is one of the grandest harbors in the world. It has two thousand miles of shore line, and within this harbor the entire Pacific fleet will ride at anchor, and the navies of Great Britain, Germany, China, Japan, France and Russia will be represented.

Many of the States of the Union are participating in the Exposition. Several have buildings and many more will make exhibits. A number of counties in the State of Washington will erect buildings of their own. The United States Government has five buildings, its main structure, and separate ones for Alaska, Hawaiian Islands, Philippine Islands and fisheries. Canada's building is one of the largest and most attractive on the grounds. The Japanese Government's building is typical of the enterprise and art of that nation.

One unique claim is put forth by the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific promoters, and that is that theirs will be the only exposition complete on the day of opening. Not only do they make this claim, but they are putting forth their photographs and figures to substantiate it. Six of the buildings were complete eight months before the date of opening, and the first exhibit was installed in the Oregon Building seven months before the people were to pass through it. California had her building ready for occupancy six months in advance, and the gardens and lawns were all sodded and abloom long ago. Unlike the majority of exposition structures, built of flimsy materials and intended to last only for a few weeks, seven of the structures here are of permanent character, and will revert to the University of Washington, on whose ground the fair is to be held, an addition of the value of $605,000 to the equipment of the State College.

The Exposition Monument, which stands on the plaza in front of the United States Government Building, will be entirely covered with gold from Alaska and the Yukon. About seven thousand dollars' worth of gold dust will be used for the purpose. The monument is in the form of an ornamental Corinthian column carrying an astronomical globe showing the signs of the zodiac and surmounted by an American eagle.

At the head of the Cascade Court stands another monument typifying "The Spirit of the Pacific," in which the sculptor has used the aboriginal races of the Pacific as models for the central figures.

A stadium has been erected for field sports, and besides the usual contests between noted athletes for valuable prizes, the Amateur Athletic Union contests for 1909 will be held here. A United States life-saving station will give practical exhibits of its work and a submarine boat will be one of the attractions of Lake Union.

As the name implies, the exposition was designed to exploit the resources of the western United States and that strip of Canada which intervenes between Washington and Alaska, but the Foreign Exhibition Palace will house displays not only from Germany, France, Great Britain, Russia and other larger countries, but from Panama and Peru, Siam and San Salvador, Formosa, Korea, China, Chile and Colombia as well.

THE OFFICIAL EMBLEM.

If the visitor to the fair seeks information regarding Alaska he can find out everything there is to learn about it by a few hours' study in the Alaska building. Every feature of that great north country will be exploited, from working models of the mines that send their millions in gold to the outer country to the little flower that lifts its head to greet the midnight sun. From that great part of Alaska that reaches into the tempered zone of the Pacific currents to the ice fields that lose themselves in the barren wastes of the top of the world will come men and material to tell the story of the land of gold.

It goes without saying that there will be an amusement street, the Pay Streak, which will combine all the pleasures and divertisements made popular since the Chicago Midway and the St. Louis Pike.

Six transcontinental railroads have terminals in Seattle, five of them crossing our own country while the sixth, the Canadian Pacific, spans the mountains and prairies of the Dominion. All of them have made special rates, and visitors from Eastern points have an unusual opportunity to vary their travel experience. As the city has been preparing for this exposition for years, there is an abundance of first-class hotel accommodation and local transportation.

The Seattle spirit that created the fair will make it successful. When it was launched the citizens were asked to subscribe $500,000 in stock. They subscribed to $650,000 in a single day, and the capitalization had to be increased to meet the demand. In October, 1908, when it was necessary to raise more money, Seattle people took $350,000 bonds in two days. The landscape department asked for 25,000 geranium plants, and on one Saturday afternoon the people of the city took 40,000 to the grounds. This is the sort of enthusiasm that always wins. How far this enthusiasm has carried the people of Seattle may be judged from the fact that seven buildings for the Fair were completed eight months before the day set for the opening. That it will be a big thing is evident from the fact that it will cost $10,000,00 and will cover 250 acres of ground in the midst of a beautiful prospect bordering two lakes and fronting the Cascades over which flow 14,000 gallons of water each minute.

The Spectator

Mrs. Taft's Ambition

According to the Examiner, Mrs. Taft, wife of the chief magistrate of the United States, has decreed that Washington shall become the center of American social life. From the same veracious authority I learn that Mrs. Taft has "hurled a direct challenge into the very teeth of the ultra-fashionable New Yorkers, who, intrenched behind their years of leadership and their inexhaustible millions, have made the world believe that their own little 'Four Hundred' is representative of everything best in American life and is the pivot around which society revolves;" also, that Mrs. Taft "threatens not only the overthrow of their leadership, but the opening of the doors to an aristocracy of breeding and position rather than to an aristocracy of wealth." This is hot stuff, but it is not all. The Examiner's fine writer is a demon for this kind of journalism. He is chock-a-block with language, and it is entitled to further notice, as it spreads and boils and takes on power in its perfervid course. "While the startling metropolitans are recovering their breath after the first onslaught on their social stronghold," he tells us, "America's women—meaning, of course, those outside New York, and therefore no matter what position they may occupy in their own communities, outside the Four Hundred—are arranging themselves stoutly on the side of the genuine first lady of the land." Phew! how you do sweat as you labor through that Ciceronian sentence! But let us plod on. "Who should be the social dictator of America if not the wife of the President? they ask." Who asks? I read what purported to be interviews held by the reporter with representatives of our provincial aristocracy, and I failed to find that any of them asked this question. Not one of them gave evidence of any profound feeling on the subject. Indeed, several of them made it quite clear that they were absolutely indifferent as to where the social center of this democratic country is to be located. Mrs. Will Taylor, whose picture appeared on the Examiner's first page, and who was represented to be "one of the three leaders of local society who indorse Mrs. Taft's idea," was quoted as follows on the second page: "Never having been in Washington, I haven't any idea as to whether or not it should be the center of social life." Thus we see that the interview and the caption are somewhat discordant, but of no consequence to an up-to-date yellow journalist is the failure of a society queen to justify the publication of her counterfeit presentment or give verisimilitude to a bald and unconvincing narrative. The only harmony for which he strives, this poet of journalism, born to sport in the sunshine's golden braids, is that of his own sentences, which, rounded like the celestial spheres, are similarly melodious to ears attuned to ragtime.

An Impossible Project

As to the impassioned assault that is projected on the social entity of Gotham's Four Hundred, I have no means of computing its seriousness. Nor am I inclined to speculation on the subject, for I am almost as unsusceptible to buncombe as a wooden cigar-store Indian. Mrs. Taft may he as silly as she is represented to bd by the Examiner, but disinclined as I am to do the lady injustice, I will not assume that the aberrations imputed to her are really among her personal characteristics. If what the Examiner says of Mrs. Taft is true, then our joy over the extinction of Mr. Roosevelt is not unalloyed, for we have with us the recollection of a sweet, unobtrusive woman who occupied the White House with dignity and discretion; who attended to her social duties with good taste, and who had no desire to plant the seeds of snobbery or ape the exotic customs of foreign courts. Mrs. Taft is represented to be intent upon transferring the social capital from New York to Washington and "opening the doors to an aristocracy of breeding and position rather than to an aristocracy of wealth." This project is comparable with Mr. Roosevelt's ambition to simplify spelling and just as feasible. Mrs. Taft may be able to organize a social clique in Washington, but that is the extent of her power. Social centers are not transplanted by resolution, by edict or statute or constitutional amendment. As for an aristocracy of breeding and position, that is as far from possible in Washington under the present form of government as a plutocracy of hodcarriers in San Francisco. We do not elect our best bred men to office; nor do we keep them in office long enough to make their position of great consequence. When de Tocqueville visited this country to study our political institutions he was struck by nothing more than the tendency to elevate mediocrities to office. He observed that the most intellectual men that he met were in private life. Conditions have not changed. The only class that really savors of an aristocracy in this country and which would be available for the purpose imputed to Mrs. Taft is that of the military department, which is recruited from all strata of society and polished at West Point and Annapolis. Our army and navy officers have social aspirations, but they have to marry rich women to be able to make a showing, and the women of the army and the navy are so extremely sensitive to the amenities of military life with its distinctions of rank, that many of them betray the instincts of insufferable snobs.

Taft Knows His California

From a gentleman who spent a great deal of time in Mr. Taft's company some weeks ago I learn that the President is well supplied with information on the subject of political conditions in San Francisco. He knows all about our leading reformers and their wonderful achievements and still more wonderful designs. What he thinks of them he did not disclose, but he made it clear that it will not be his policy to pronounce all men crooks who do not agree with reformers. He conceives it to be possible for a man to be an anti-reformer without being an undesirable citizen. In other words, he entertains the old-fashioned notion that a question may have two sides.

The New Cabinet

Mr. Taft's Cabinet is causing some uneasiness among Mr. Roosevelt's friends. The new officers are not of the temperament of the members of the defunct Tennis Cabinet. For example, there is not a Bonaparte among them, nor even a Garfield. Here were names to impart lustre to an Administration! Bonaparte! Garfield! Here were names that were synonymous with greatness! And yet their possessors were of the Tennis Cabinet, distinctly of the tennis calibre. Only two of the Roosevelt Cabinet have been retained—James Wilson of the Department of Agriculture, who will enter on his fourth successive administration, and Mr. Meyer, who has moved from the Post Office to the Navy Department. Bonaparte has been succeeded by George W. Wickersham of New York, who has kept so much out of the political eye that his biography is not be found in publications that glorify public men. But the bar of New York is proud of Mr. Wickersham. He was associated with the President's brother, Henry W. Taft, in the firm of Strong & Cadwallader, of which he is a member, though his name does not appear in the firm name. In recent years he has been counsel for August Belmont in many of the transactions of the subway company. He is therefore a corporation lawyer.

Smallest Man, Biggest Brain

The Premier of the Cabinet is Philander C. Knox. He has been described as being as sensational as a volume of Blackstone, as witty as a copy of the revised statutes, as communicative as a Supreme Court Justice. No one ever saw him display emotion or heard him utter a hasty, ill-tempered word. He is calm, serene, cool, calculating, methodical, precise, analytical. Humorist friends say his recreation is reading the Constitution. Among his intimates Senator Knox is a delightful conversationalist and a genial host. He has accumulated a comfortable fortune from the law. In Washington he has a fine house and an exceptional library. He reads on the top floor and has a workshop in the basement. His favorite retreat is a beautiful country place at Valley Forge, Pennsylvania, on the site of Washington's ill-fated winter camp of Revolutionary days. He belongs to the Republican oligarchy of Senatorial leaders headed by Senators Aldrich and Hale, having entered that exclusive circle the day he took his seat. No long apprenticeship was required of him. Foreign affairs of State and diplomatic relations are already familiar to him. Though long a lawyer for corporations, his greatest legal victory was in defeating them as counsel for the Government in overthrowing the Northern Securities Company, the most gigantic of railway combines.

The Heavyweight War Secretary

The War Department has an able lawyer at its head. Judge Dickinson gave up a $35,000 a year position with the Illinois Central Railroad Company to enter the Cabinet at $12,000, which will not pay the cost of living in Washington. His selection was partly geographical and partly due to Mr. Taft's desire to surround himself with strong legal advisers. Judge Dickinson's friends say his most striking characteristic is his remarkable administrative power. His thinking is straightforward. He sees deep and through the details of a proposition. His next point of strength is hard work. A few years ago a complimentary dinner was given him in Nashville. The invitation cards bore a design representing a ladder showing his steps to prominence. The inscription was, "He works while others sleep." In personality, Judge Dickinson has the geniality of a big man. He is six feet three inches tall and weighs 270 pounds. He has accumulated wealth and his wife has riches. Between him and Mr. Taft there is intimate friendship. Politics cut small figure in this appointment. When a boy Judge Dickinson was a soldier in the Confederate army. What part he took in political affairs generally was with the Democratic party.

Secretary of the Treasury

Franklin MacVeagh, who is to head the Treasury, is not a financier by profession, nor a politician in practice, yet he is a scholastic expert in both. He studied law in youth and then abandoned it for a business career in Chicago as a wholesale grocer. Next to Mr. Wilson he will be the oldest man in the cabinet. He is a Yale man of the class of 1862, and now is close to seventy years of age. In Chicago public life he has been the useful citizen. Thirty-five years ago he was president of the Citizens' Associations that accomplished many reforms in municipal affairs, and frequently he has participated in movements for better government. He was strong for civil service in local government. In 1894 he was the unsuccessful candidate of the Democratic party of Illinois for United States Senator. More recently he has inclined toward the Republican party. One of the most striking features of the new Cabinet is its tendency to quiet reserve. None of its leading members has any liking for the spectacular, the hurrah and the head-cracking policy.

"What do you mean sir by walking straight into me?"
"A thousand pardons, sir, but I see double, and I tried to pass between you."

Platt on Roosevelt

While Citizen Theodore Roosevelt is preaching morality in The Outlook, Citizen Thomas Collier Platt is relating reminiscences in the Cosmopolitan. Of the two, in my humble judgment, Mr. Platt is the superior literary artist. His style is not so ponderous as that of the great message writer and he does not mar his work with platitudes. Besides, while there is much of human interest in Platt, there is nothing but self-consciousness in Roosevelt. Now when Mr. Roosevelt is posing before the groundlings as a great moralist he is not half so interesting as when held up to our view as a plain, ordinary politician by Mr. Platt. It was Mr. Platt who made Mr. Roosevelt, governor of New York. He relates that when Teddy returned as a popular hero, he asked him if he would take the nomination.

"Would I?" said Roosevelt. "I would be delighted."

Teddy's Affidavit.

Roosevelt saw Platt at the Fifth Avenue Hotel just before the State convention and they buried past differences. Then the friends of Governor Black threw a bombshell into the Platt-Roosevelt camp by producing an affidavit made by Roosevelt, in which, to avoid paying taxes in New York, he declared that Washington was his legal residence. Platt called a meeting of friends to discuss the situation, among them Elihu Root and Chauncey M. Depew. "When this meeting was being held," says Mr. Platt, "a committee representing the opposition to Mr. Roosevelt, headed by Mr. Lauterbach, called in my rooms at the Fifth Avenue Hotel. I left the assemblage of my friends and went to meet this committee. They had with them Mr. Roosevelt's affidavit of his non-residence in the State of New York, which they asked me to read and explain how in the face of such a declaration it would be possible to proceed with the plans for his gubernatorial nomination. Lacking any other expedient, I informed them that if they were possessed of all the facts they would view the matter differently and that later I hoped to be able to apprise them of such facts. "I then rejoined my friends in another room and reported to them what Mr. Lauterbach and his associates had presented for my consideration. At this juncture Mr. Roosevelt took me aside and said with a trepidation. I had never before and have never since seen him display, 'I can not remain in this fight; I must withdraw from the race.' His desire to withdraw was made apparent to every one in the room. The fatal effect of his withdrawal was to me so manifest that I replied: 'You must not withdraw. You must trust to me to solve this problem and elect you governor of the State.' In order to emphasize my determination and to restore his courage I said, with brutal frankness, 'Is the hero of San Juan a coward?' He replied with his customary vehemence, 'No, I am not a coward.' We then resumed the discussion of methods of procedure, and at my suggestion Mr. Root went to Massachusetts, where Mr. Choate was sojourning, in order to obtain from Mr. Choate his views in the premises. The meeting then disbanded and was resumed at Saratoga some days later, where the Republican State Convention was assembling. At this second meeting there were present Mr. Root, Mr. Depew, Frank Hiscock, George W. Ray, myself and others. Mr. Root reported to me that Mr. Choate had expressed the opinion that the case was hopeless, and added for himself that he had grave doubts of the possibility of making a successful contention in Mr. Roosevelt's favor. He said that Mr. Choate expressed the further opinion that the only hope of success lay in forcing the nomination through the convention by sheer weight of numbers. I asked him if he had mentioned the matter to any one else, to which he replied that he had not done so. I asked him to refrain from doing so, told him that the plan to nominate Mr. Roosevelt must be carried through at all hazards, and that he must appear before the convention on the following day and make the argument in favor of Mr. Roosevelt's nomination. The gentlemen then addressed themselves to the task of formulating arguments that could be presented to the convention in support of Mr. Roosevelt's nomination. Mr. Ray probably adduced the principal arguments on which on the following day Mr. Root made his famous speech in support of Mr. Roosevelt's candidacy and eligibility. This task Mr. Root performed so exceedingly well that the opposition to the nomination of Mr. Roosevelt was effectually quelled."

Female Lecturer (in an impassioned moment)—They say that genius is exclusively masculine. Men claim superiority as sculptors, painters and poets. Well, let me ask you: "What man ever gave birth to triplets."

Welcome to the Queen of Bavardes

Miss Fraser is in town. This is the lady's name "in private life," as the dramatic critics say. Miss Fraser is a writing woman in daily journalism, which is only a little lower than "real literature." She is an importation and an exportation all in one—imported to promote the gayety of San Francisco; exported to deepen the gloom of New York. In the big provincial city she was "Cholly Knickerbocker"; in the little city of the provinces she is "Cholly Francisco." When I heard that she was "coming up" from Los Angeles I was glad in my heart for I had vivid recollection of her "Cholly Knickerbocker" method of irritating the smart set of Gotham, and I had hopes that she would perform a similar service for our own bunch of self-made aristocrats. I don't know whether I am doomed to disappointment or not. Miss Fraser wasn't very hard on the parvenus and elite of Los Angeles; but I keep in mind that the Los Angeles agglomeration of lumber, pork, oil, barley and beer is not nearly as picturesque as our own mixture of soap suds, ditch water, rum-and-gum, boarding house pie, miners' wages and sugar in the barrel. Perhaps she is loading up on the "social conditions" in San Francisco. The newspaper with which she is connected maintains a corps of competent bavardes who are au courant in all that pertains to the secret history of our mushroom aristocracy, including the Burlingame set, and these mute, inglorious historians of San Francisco's Four Hundred are probably telling Miss Fraser all about it from washboard to banquet-board. I shall look for a lot of spicy gossip, thinly veiled, of course, from "Cholly Francisco," before she goes back to her more congenial atmosphere of New York, where the aristocracy no longer has a codfish flavor and where they dare speak above a whisper of "our grandfather." If Miss Fraser could get on intimate terms with Mrs. Darling and Mrs. Eleanor Martin, she would learn a lot about our "best families" that would make mighty interesting reading for the rest of us who have an ancestry of whom we are not compelled to be ashamed.

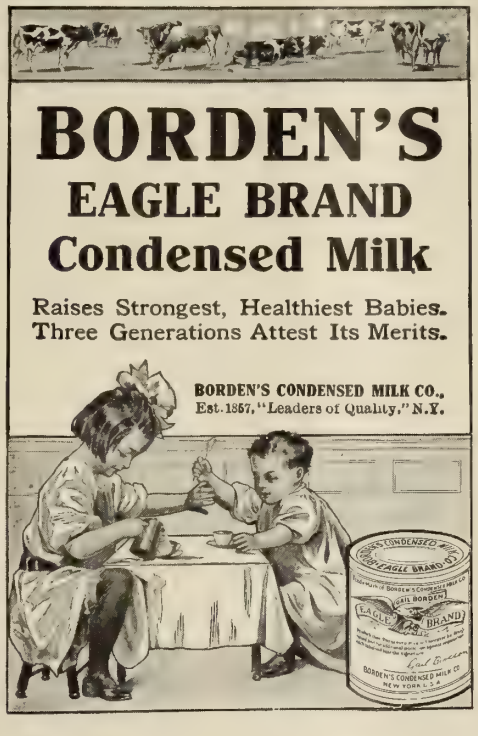
False Prophets



About this time I take pleasure in gloating over Prophet Perret and Prophet Marchand. I have waited long enough to be sure that their prophecies cannot be fulfilled, and from that vantage point of time I point the finger of scorn at them. Prophet Perret is the earthquake and volcano sharp who predicted the destruction of Messina after it happened, or who was reported, after that disaster, to have predicted the "cataclysm," as it was called in the newspapers. Prophet Perret said that there would be earthquakes in Sicily and southeastern Europe in February more terrible than any that had yet occurred, basing his prediction on the astronomical theory that the sun and moon at meridian exert sufficient power of attraction to lift the crust of the earth and create high tides on the sea of molten matter in the interior of the earth. Prophet Marchand of the Paris Observatory made similar predictions for France and western Europe, worked out on the same hypothesis of astronomical influence. Nothing serious has happened, and I feel justified in putting these eminent scientists in the Professor Puddle class, which also includes Madame Thebes, Professor Spangler and Zadkiel, the horrible horoscopist of impending horrors. The malefic aspects of the semi-quartile, the semi-square, the square, the sesquiquadrate, the opposition, the high meridian and the planetary conjunction are now past and these malign conditions will not, according to the calculation of Prophet Marchand, recur for 168 years. In the meantime we shall all be quite dead and entirely forgotten. Some of us will perish by battle, murder and sudden death; others will be killed in unpredicted earthquakes, and still others will die of old age. When the really fatal period returns only our very distant posterity will be here to face the perils which we have just escaped. This is my personal prediction, and I take credit to myself that it is a much more comfortable guess than those which Prophet Perret and Prophet Marchand inflict upon us. That prophet should be honored in his own country who prophesies post-morten disasters.

She—If you weren't drunk then why did you walk up and down stairs for nearly two hours?

He—My dear, I brought you home a dozen oranges, and they kept rolling down stairs.

Dargie Banqueted

The banquet given in honor of William E. Dargie at the St. Mark Hotel, Oakland, Thursday evening, was a high tribute to the man who has made the Oakland Tribune the best and most influential evening newspaper in California. It was also a striking proof of his Statewide popularity and the high standing of his friends. The banquet was given by the employees of the Tribune in honor of Mr. Dargie's fifty-fifth birthday, as a token of their affection and esteem for their employer. The company was a distinguished one, comprising over a hundred of the most notable men in the State, including the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Justices of the Supreme, Appellate and Superior benches, the Mayors of Oakland, Berkeley, and Alameda, leaders of the bar, merchants, bankers, members of the Legislature, and many other dignitaries. It was a rare testimonial of goodwill to a man whose kindness of heart is proverbial, who has earned the reputation of never turning his back on a friend or an enemy, and whose pocket nerve is always touched by the cry of distress. J. E. Baker, of the Tribune's editorial staff, acted as toastmaster. The post-prandial addresses were in a happy vein, teeming with the good fellowship of the occasion. Among the speakers were Governor Gillett, Supreme Justices Henshaw and Melvin, Mayor Mott, Samuel M. Shortridge, John A. Britton, Col. John P. Irish, James H. O'Brien, H. C. Capwell and Geo. Knight. Bench, bar, trade, finance, industry, literature and art were all represented in the gathering. Nearly 250 sat down to the table. Among them were: Garrett McEnerney, Lieutenant-Governor Porter, George A. Knight, Secretary of State Charles F. Curry, Dent Robert, John J, Barrett, Appellate Justice S. P. More Limelight for Heney

One of the muckraking periodicals of New York makes the following extraordinary announcement: "Over a year ago this magazine told the story of Heney's fight in San Francisco. Since then all sorts of things have happened, including the attempted murder of Heney. Will Irwin, himself an old San Franciscan, tells in the April number the true stories of plots, abductions, dynamiting, and attempted murder that have been undertaken against Heney and others concerned in the fight against graft. It reads like a melodrama—but it's all true." So Will Irwin is going to "do up" Heney! Lincoln Steffens has "done him up" several times, once from the point of view of his Arizona gun-play, and now they are paying Will Irwin $200 to do him up again from the point of view of the man in front of the gun. "It reads like a melodrama," asserts the advertising manager of the magazine; "but it's all true." A melodrama, sure enough; but all untrue—as melodramas must be if they are worthy of the name. This "story of intrigue and crime in San Francisco," written by Will Irwin from data furnished by Francis J. Heney, Fremont Older, William J. Burns and Lincoln Steffens will be melodramatic, but it will be as false as any blood-and-thunder piece ever staged at Morosco's or the old Bowery Theater. It will glorify Heney, of course, but it will carefully conceal the fact that Heney was, until quite recently, a high-priced lawyer in the employ of the Spring Valley and the Contra Costa water companies; that he has received from those corporations nearly $100,000 for whatever services he rendered; that the Examiner of this city made irritating inquiry as to the kind of service he rendered for the Contra Costa Water Company in return for $30,000, demanding the production of a draft, check or receipt for the money; that since he has been the special prosecutor for Rudolph Spreckels' graft prosecution, he has received from the United States Government, through the Department of Justice, $40,000 and allowed it to be published in the organs of the prosecution that he has "impoverished himself in the cause of civic reform"; that in his present fortuitous occupation as a special prosecutor for a private prosecution he is merely assisting James D. Phelan and Rudolph Spreckels to accomplish their selfish and mercenary purposes; and that the entire scheme of the prosecution, of which Heney is the visible embodiment, is permeated with malignant purpose and sordid revenge. None of this will be told in Will Irwin's "story of intrigue and crime in San Francisco," which is to "read like a melodrama," and which the advertisement writer of the magazine insists is "all true." I predict that not only will it be a "story" not half true, but that it will be a tissue of falsehoods and gross misrepresentation from start to finish. I know Will Irwin and his work; and I know those from whom he receives his "information." But I don't blame Irwin for earning his stipend of $200 in this manner. The laborer in any cause, however disreputable, is always worthy of his hire.

Paying the Piper Out of the Public Treasury

The Bulletin must have been quite flabbergasted by the authentic report from the records of the Department of Justice to the effect that during the time Francis J. Heney has been acting as special prosecutor for the graft prosecution he has received $40,000 for which he has given no service to the Federal government. The statement by Heney, published in the Call, that this money is part of his original fee for prosecuting the land fraud cases is very weak; it may be true or it may be untrue; but it does not remove from the special prosecutor the stigma of second-hand servitude—it does not absolve him from the suspicion that he has been deliberately "loaned" to Rudolph Spreckels by Roosevelt or the Department of Justice for the purpose of directing and managing the affairs of the District Attorney's office of this city in the interest of a private prosecution inspired by Rudolph Spreckels and James D. Phelan. It doesn't matter so much how much money Heney receives from the United States Government during his "vacation"; but it does matter that a persistent deception has been practiced on this community as to the motives that inspire Heney in this prosecution. The Bulletin, for example, believing that the records of the Department of Justice were safe from hostile scrutiny, has constantly flung the lie to the man in the street that Francis J. Heney is "impoverishing his own meager fortune" in this "work of civic reform," insisting from day to day that Heney is absolutely without self-interest in this prosecution, and preparing the way for a final appeal to the "patriotic citizens of San Francisco" to put their hands in their pockets and give this self-sacrificing advocate of their interests a fee commensurate with the labor that he is performing on their behalf. The Bulletin was almost on the verge of passing the hat for Heney money when this bombshell from the office of the Attorney-General burst in the editorial sanctum. Now the people will not be called on to pay the Heney board bill. If he is indeed "impoverished" after receiving $65,000 from the government, $40,000 of which has been paid during the two years he has been acting as Rudolph Spreckels' special prosecutor, that is his misfortune, and the rest of us are not called upon to help him out of the hole into which he may have precipitated himself. It must have been a bad quarter of an hour for the Bulletin people, for Phelan and for Spreckels when that exposure of Heney's unearned increment was made; and there must have been several very serious conniption fits in consequence.

Railroad Man Promoted

Felicitations are pouring in on James B. Duffy these days on his promotion to the position of general agent of the passenger department of the Santa Fe railway system. This is another example of the reward of efficiency. Mr. Duffy entered the service of the Santa Fe in December, 1889, and for a time he worked as a ticket agent at the foot of Market Street, but he did not remain long in the ranks. Talent in the employ of a corporation is never permitted to languish.

Josie Mansfield in Poverty

The discovery that the once beautiful and notorious Josie Mansfield is living in poverty, sickness and obscurity in a little western town recalls again the particulars of the Stokes-Fiske tragedy of nearly four decades ago. The story was as sordid as any of its kind, a mercenary woman, a brace of infatuated men, a murder, and an aftermath of unhappiness and misery. Stokes was a coarse and pudgy little broker, but he had money and jewels to dispense, and the woman in the case was willing to play Beauty to any Beast who would supply her with the things she craved. When Jim Fiske appeared on the scene with more money and more jewels, and a personal presence more in keeping with her own, she had no hesitation about transferring her "affections." Jealousy, hot temper, and the ever-ready revolver removed Fiske from the scene, sent Stokes to expiate his crime in a New York penitentiary, and left the primal cause of all the woe to end her days a paralytic and a pensioner on the charity of strangers. Edward S. Stokes outlived his penitentiary sentence, but died of "old age" when barely sixty, worn out with the impetuosity of his life and his constant efforts to protect his newly acquired fortune and protect his rights. One of the hardest fought civil suits in New York was his contest with his brother, E. D. Stokes, for the possession of the Hoffman House. Though usually taciturn and unsmiling, even stolid, during his later years, he once, in an unwonted burst of confidence, made a strange admission that he often "saw" Fisk. "Night time or day time, he comes to me. There are no grave clothes, no wounds, no mournful looks. He appears just as I saw him in good health. It is nothing supernatural; it is memory." He professed no burning pangs of remorse for what he had done, but "better a thousand times be the victim than the slayer. It is the living, the survivor, who must bear the brunt of his victim's punishment." Stokes would have gladly turned to charity and good works in his later years, but he bitterly lamented his inability to do so. "What good can I do?" he complained. "They keep me involved in lawsuits to hold a single dollar. They will not even let me try to do good that I may forget."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks and Bonds

Nothing of a sensational character has happened in stock and bond securities during the past week outside of a little strength shown here and there in a few specialties. Wall Street is not by any means bearish at the present time; the more venturesome shorts make drives when a period of weakness comes into the market, but they are not slow to cover their commitments when there is a sign of strength. The market is in a waiting position. Those who are in the market are standing by their guns, while those who are out prefer to await the outcome of tariff revision before taking on new commitments. Money continues easy. We are now entering upon a period when crop prospects will dominate the security markets. * * * There is again talk of Union Pacific making some disbursements of its well-known holdings. Whether this will be done in the way of increasing the dividend to 12 per cent or making an extra dividend is what is agitating the minds of holders of Union Pacific common stock. The operating expenses, as shown by the last report, have been reduced from 54½ per cent to 46½ per cent, a most remarkable showing. * * * Hawley and his friends are becoming very active in Missouri, Kansas and Texas, and much higher prices are looked for in these securities. Kansas City Southern is being advanced on rumors of favorable traffic arrangements with the Union Pacific. It is more than likely that Harriman has secured control of this property through the purchase of the John W. Gates holdings. * * * There is a great deal of favorable talk going the rounds to the effect that Brooklyn Rapid Transit will be lifted much higher. * * * It looks as if the Steel stocks have seen bottom. Schwab is talking bearish. It is always a good plan to put the opposite meaning to his public announcements. . . . Wall Street Journal of a recent date says: "United Railways of San Francisco 4s continue to sell below intrinsic value, according to some conservative bankers. The company's earnings have almost recovered from the effects of the earthquake and the property has been rehabilitated physically. The underlying liens are protected by ample sinking funds and are rapidly being cancelled. Following the earthquake there was a disastrous strike, but this has been broken and the labor union destroyed. With the approaching completion of the Western Pacific, San Francisco will have additional railroad facilities and the future of the city is assured."

Grain

The center of attraction in the wheat pit has been the May option, and fluctuations have covered a wide range, the high price on the crop being made March 4th when May wheat in Chicago sold at 119½. The extreme high price for this option is due more than anything else to the long line for wheat held by the bull crowd and estimated to be about forty million bushels; and, as they have generally been successful the bears do not make a determined stand and run to cover on any signs of the bull leader becoming aggressive. Of course, there are a good many things to favor the bulls; first, the reduction in the Argentine exportable surplus from 125 million bushels to 85 million bushels, and the high prices being paid the world over for cash wheat with prospects of a very short crop in Germany. * * * The bull leader contends that it is only a question of time when Europe must have our wheat, and when we shall make the price. The domestic situation in wheat is strong. * * * Cash wheat in the southwestern market commands a premium of from five to ten cents a bushel over the May option, and as high as 1.32 was bid for a choice lot of No. 2 Red at St. Louis, and at Minneapolis No. 1 Northern Spring sold as high as $1.25; as long as these high prices prevail for the cash article, it looks as if the leading bull interest will have no trouble in disposing of any wheat that may be delivered on May contract. * * * July and September wheat, while not quite as active as the May option, have commanded the attention of the outsider, especially the July option which sold as high as 107 March 4th. This option has been the target for bear attacks every time it got above the dollar mark, as the price looked for the new crop, and there was less chance of manipulation; but the big discount it is selling at under the May option and the high prices being paid for winter wheat which this option represents, have started many of the conservative traders to take a more optimistic view, especially so in view of the fact that the condition of the growing crop when it went into the winter was 85.3 against 94.5 last year and a reduction of over two million in acreage. The season of the "crop killer" is now at hand, and we may expect all manner of reports as to the growing crop. Any deterioration of the growing crop will be like adding oil to the flames of an already bullish cash situation.

Cotton

The cotton market was active and higher the first of the week, March advancing to 9.63 cents, May to 9.60 cents, and July to 9.58 cents, at which point profit taking set in, and prices lost 8 to 10 points on Friday. Reports of generally unsettled weather in the eastern portion of Texas and part cloudy weather for west Texas on Friday started some liquidation of October option which was continued Saturday on official forecast for cloudy weather and probably showers in Texas over Sunday. . . . The week-end figures were moderately bullish, the visible supply of American cotton having decreased 110,199 bales for the week, against 82,365 bales last year. Spinners takings also were on a more liberal scale than expected; 305,000 bales against 297,000 bales last year, and 351,000

The Pearl Mystery

At this writing there is as much interest as ever in society in the mystery of the Crocker pearls. Interest has been kept alive by the detectives who have been trying to solve the problem of the disappearance. Apparently the detectives have considered the probability of the existence of a Raffles in the fashionable herd, for their inquiries have indicated a suspicion that the pearls were stolen during the dance. As a consequence, there has been a great deal of gossip, from which one learns with surprise of pecuniary embarassments and of the little confidence that some of our society folk have in one another. Teacup chatter is enlivened these days with conjectures of a most startling character, and some of them are said to be justified by questions that have been asked by the detectives. Among the stories afloat is one to the effect that it has been whispered in Jennie Crocker's ear that her pearls are in the possession of one of her dearest friends.

Prima Facie Evidence

Ned Greenway's sense of humor was put to the test in the Bohemian Club the other day. "I am told," said a genial wit, addressing the arbiter elegantiarum of the local smart set, "that you made an extra dry remark when you heard about the loss of Jennie Crocker's pearls."

"What was it?" Greenway asked, his tone bespeaking intense curiosity mingled with alarm.

"I was told," said the wit, whose demeanor was most grave, whose manner that of a person lodging a serious accusation, "that you observed that Miss Crocker had cast her pearls before Mrs. Alexander's guests." The Czar was at once in a panic. "My dear chap!" he exclaimed, "I pledge you my word I never said that."

"I believe you," said the bohemian.

Mrs. Carolan Holds the Ponies

Mrs. Francis Carolan, the queen of Burlingame society, has loomed up as a forbidding figure in polo circles. From Coronado, where the fourth annual polo tournament opens this Saturday, came the startling news in the early part of the week that Mrs. Carolan had made the announcement that she would permit no ponies to be sent from the Carolan stables. To say that polo circles were greatly agitated by the report is to put it mildly. The men from Burlingame were more astounded than when they heard of the loss of Miss Crocker's pearls. If they had been told that a whole flock of climbers were threatening the prestige of Burlingame with their presence they would not have been more profoundly concerned. Divers were the reasons assigned for Mrs. Carolan's hostile attitude toward the tournament. One of them is that she objects to the methods of one of the players and considers him a hindrance to his fellows. According to another version, her prejudice against the player is due not so much to his poor playing as to his sentiments with reference to a guest of the Burlingame club. If Mrs. Carolan sticks to her resolution, the second Burlingame team will not be able to participate in the tournament. This team comprises Captain Guesl, J. O. Tobin Jr., George T. Cameron, and Francis J. Carolan. It does not affect the first Burlingame team consisting of R. M. Tobin, T. A. Driscoll, John Lawson, and W. S. Hobart. This tournament is to be one of the most important ever played west of the Rocky Mountains. Hitherto no teams save those of California have taken part in these annual contests, and though Riverside, Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, the Military of Monterey, and the Burlingame Club sent teams of considerable merit in other years, additional zest is added on this occasion by the presence of the famous Ranelagh Club of London and the Bryn Mawr of Philadelphia to compete against Riverside, Los Angeles, and Burlingame. Santa Barbara would have been represented but that the veteran, Frank J. Mackey, who has been spending the winter at Riverside, bought up all the good ponies in that region. Burlingame has had things pretty much its own way during the years of 1906-7-8, capturing the championship each year and winning the trophy permanently, as well as a round dozen of silver goblets, of which R. M. Tobin and Walter Scott Hobart won three each, John Lawson and "Tom" Driscoll two, and Francis J. Carolan and J. O. Tobin Jr. one apiece. These successive victories of the Burlingame team were due to the superiority of their ponies and to the fact that the men, having played together for a long period, made a better showing in combination than their opponents.

A Belle of Other Days

Mrs. Van Voorhies, the wealthy Sacramento widow who recently married a man thirty years her junior, and thus occasioned much newspaper comment, was Miss Georgie Mountford, the daughter of a pioneer real estate dealer of the Capital city. She was a noted beauty in her girlhood, and all pioneer Sacramentans will remember the occasion of the brilliant wedding of Miss Anna Cadwalader, the daughter of the late General Cadwalader, and Robert N. Graves, when Miss Mountford was one of the bridesmaids and created a sensation by her stunning appearance. She married a Mr. Van Voorhies, a widower many years her senior, with two daughters. He amassed a fortune in his business, that of saddlery and harness-making, and when he died he provided well for his widow. She is said to have preserved her good looks and is even now a very beautiful woman and does not look her age within many years.

The McMahon-Borel Engagement

Although it is nearly two weeks since the engagement of Miss Madie McMahon and Anton Borel, Jr., was made public the surprise and attendant excitement have not subsided. Only the immediate families of the interested parties were in their confidence, and even the most intimate friends were taken by surprise by the announcement. Congratulations and felicitations have been showered on the young people, both of whom are very popular here and in San Mateo, where the groom-to-be makes his home, and where the fair bride-elect spends most of her summers. Miss McMahon is an exceptionally pretty girl, bright and attractive. She was to have been a debutante of the coming winter had not the little blind god been so forehanded in hastening her into the ranks of the young wives. She is a granddaughter of the late Bernard McMahon, the well-known contractor who built the railroad to Lake Tahoe. Her father, the late J. A. McMahon, was also in the same line of business, and was one of the best known and liked men on the coast. Mrs. McMahon and her daughter make their home at the Hillcrest, with occasional visits to their bungalow, which almost adjoins the Borel property in San Mateo. Anton Borel has appeared much in San Francisco society. In Burlingame, where he is a member of the Hunt Club and the Country Club, he is much sought after. He is an enthusiastic horseman, and as he was regarded as one of the few eligible bachelors of whom society could boast, there is a little chagrin and some disappointment at the announcement of his engagement, especially as it was managed so quietly as to arouse no suspicion. He belongs to the well-known Borel family, which is one of the oldest on the coast, and intimately associated with both the physical and social development of Burlingame and San Mateo, in both of which townships they own large tracts of real estate. They are a most united family, quite content with country life and sport, and their home at Beresford is noted for its hospitality. The married daughters have their homes near the parental mansion, and the family has really never been separated, even on their annual trips, where a few months are always passed at their chateau in Switzerland. Anton Borel is the brother of Mrs. Louis Bovet, Mrs. Aylett Cotton, Mrs. John Lewis, Chonita and Guadaloupe Borel. His marriage to Miss McMahon will be an event of the late spring in San Mateo, where he has almost completed his plans for the erection of a beautiful bungalow in which to begin their home-making.

Mrs. Coit Afraid to Return

From Paris comes the news that Lily Coit is homesick but afraid to return to San Francisco. It will be remembered that Mrs. Coit disappeared very suddenly shortly after the killing of Major McClung in her rooms in the Palace Hotel. She has been abroad ever since, and although her property interests have suffered during her absence and it is important that she should return, she is in dread of the man who killed McClung. Garnett is still in prison, but his friends are endeavoring to secure his pardon. They say that if liberated he will immediately go to the Soldiers' Home. The last news received from Mrs. Coit was to the effect that she dined in Paris Christmas Eve with Mrs. Russ Wilson, who is waiting there for Mrs. Henry T. Scott and Mrs. Crockett. I hear that the famous diary which was kept by Mrs. Coit's mother, Mrs. Hitchcock, is in a safe deposit box in this city. In years past there was a great deal of talk about that diary which deals with the leading personalities of early day California society. It has been said that if it should be published it would create a tremendous sensation, but Mrs. Coit's friends say that eventually it will be destroyed.

The Joy of the Kirmess

The Kirmess is only a memory now, but a delightful one, and many of the friendships which began during the rehearsals show indications of continuing for an indefinite period. Many reunions of the men and maids who participated in the different dances have been planned for the summer, and Dorothy Van Sicklen's house party in Alameda for her particular coterie, the Fluffy Ruffles, is only the first of a series of house parties and picnics to be held during the coming months. Already the Indian dancers have planned two reunions, and there have been numerous little dinners to "our particular crowd." When the various coteries come together again on the same intimate terms as during those delightful days of the rehearsals in the Normandy Cafe, they will find no end of fun in discussing the happenings behind the scenes, the inevitable little squabbles, the bridge games between the acts, the excitement and fears lest some of the gay members of the Swing dance should be found missing from their places when the final moment came. One youth in particular, whose propensities were well known, kept them all in a state of suppressed alarm. During the first three nights he was the partaker as well as the dispenser of liquid refreshment to those who desired it, and on each occasion he stopped just in time to enable him to carry out his part with aplomb. On the last night the other Swing dancers decided to keep one watchful eye on this convivial chap, and see that he trod a straight and narrow path until after he had made his final bow to the footlights. But alas! the watchful eye had permitted itself to wink, and just before the Swing dance was called he was found incapacitated. He had imbibed to the limit of his capacity, and an upright position, much less swinging, was an impossible feat. Miss Stewart was in despair. There was no substitute, and the others were almost ready to appear on the stage. As a final and forlorn hope, Miss Stewart sent for some strong and very black coffee, which was administered to the recumbent youth in spite of his protest, and after the third cup he was sufficiently aroused to pull himself together and join his comrades. No one in the audience noticed that he was "half seas over," but the initiates admit that they breathed a sigh of relief when he was once more safely piloted to the outer darkness without mishap. Altogether the affair was a splendid success, and these little by-plays and side-issues only add to the pleasures of memory. The audience was most appreciative, and those who worked the hardest are the loudest in its praise.

Social Gaiety in Santa Barbara

The dinner party and ball given by Miss Nina Jones to Miss Susanne Kirkpatrick and her guests, Miss Wilson and Miss Alexander, last Saturday evening at the Hotel Potter, Santa Barbara, was a most enjoyable affair. Covers were laid for twenty-four guests in the Moorish dining room, which was a maze of palms and bamboos. An enormous circular table held an immense centerpiece consisting of a pyramid of jonquils with semi-hidden lights. The dinner was perfect, and Ned Greenway and a special party came from Pasadena and Los Angeles as guests. The ball which followed was a brilliant affair, the presence of so many of the shining lights of San Francisco society adding eclat to the occasion. The music was excellent, the Hotel Potter orchestra being augmented by the Arends orchestra from the Van Nuys of Los Angeles. Miss Kirkpatrick gave a moonlight party on the beach Sunday evening and a gay riding party enjoyed a morning gallop on Monday. * * * The event of the season will be a minstrel show in black face to be given in the lobby of the Hotel Potter on Wednesday evening by twenty-five of the young society people of Pasadena. Mr. Pierra Gilleland, the manager, as well as the other participants, belong to the upper stratum of wealth and distinction, and three private cars from Los Angeles and Pasadena will convey the guests from those cities to Santa Barbara. The minstrel performance will be brought to a close early enough to permit the enjoyment of the brilliant ball which is to follow. An innovation is the orchestration of the minstrel numbers for waltz and two-step, and the minstrels in whose honor the ball is to be given, will sing as the dance goes on.

The Skeleton Undraped

Society on both sides of the bay is busily discussing a sensational occurrence at a recent dinner given at the Claremont Club. The couple who were the principals in the affair have just returned from their honeymoon trip abroad. While seated at the table, during a lull in the conversation, the husband took from his pocket a wedding ring and other jewels, and, holding them in the palm of his hand, he asked: "What would you all think of a woman who threw these rings in her husband's face, saying she was tired of him?" Before the astonished guests could catch breath the wife made answer and the dialogue which followed is said to have been full of fireworks. Some of the guests hastily left the table, while the husband assured everyone that he realized the mistake he had made. Naturally, after this disclosure of the family skeleton care has been taken to suppress invitations and cut short functions at which otherwise the couple would have been prominent guests.

In the Social Spotlight

Among many delightful luncheons at the St. Francis last week one of the most delightful was that of Mrs. R. A. Eddy, who entertained forty guests last Thursday in the manner that is characteristic of this charming hostess.

Miss Jennie Crocker presided at a prettily appointed luncheon at the St. Francis a few days ago. Her guests were Mrs. Walter Martin, Mrs. Laurence I. Scott, and Miss Virginia Jolliffe.

Edward Robert Parker, fourth Earl of Morley, who is on his way to British Columbia on a hunting expedition, has taken apartments in the Hotel St. Francis for a brief visit in San Francisco. Lord Morley is a member of the Bachelors and Travellers Club of London and possesses most of the originals of Sir Joshua Reynolds, which are at present rated a very high valuation.

Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Beadle of San Francisco are registered at the Hotel Green, Pasadena.

The event of the week—in fact, the thing of paramount interest to San Francisco in a social way—is the opening of the Tapestry Room of the Hotel St. Francis. This great hall with its exquisitely sculptured pillars, its ceiling of chromatic opulence and its incomparable scheme uniting antique rugs, panels and drapery into one harmonious impression is something which transcends the experience of this city. It is really worth while.

Mr. and Mrs. H. Clay Miller, Jr., will move to the Miller home in Sausalito in April, where they will spend the summer, after having passed the winter at the Claremont in this city. Mrs. H. Clay Miller, Sr., will leave this week for Santa Barbara where she will spend the next five months.

Among the guests at the Hotel Carlton are Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Steen, who have journeyed from Stockholm, Sweden, to visit Mrs. Steen's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Center, who have made their home in Berkeley for several years past.

The Town and Country Club will move about May 1st to their new rooms on Stockton Street between Geary and Post. Robertson's book store will also move to the same building.

Mrs. Selden S. Wright has recently occupied her attractive new home on Lombard Street. Mr. and Mrs. George H. Hellmann and family have taken a house on Lombard Street adjoining that of Mrs. Wright.

Mrs. Thomas Findley of Sausalito suffered a second stroke of paralysis on Sunday afternoon and grave fears for her recovery are entertained. Mrs. Findley is the mother of those interesting matrons, Mrs. George Cardiner (Edith Findley), Mrs. Cloke (Alice Findley), wife of Captain Cloke, U. S. A., Mrs. Frank Lusk, and also of Miss Mamie Findley and Frank Findley, the well-known wool merchant who is soon to remove to Boston.

Dr. and Mrs. McNutt gave a dinner recently in honor of Mr. and Mrs. David Brown of Denver. Amongst those present were Mrs. Mamie McNutt, Miss Mary Josselyn, Miss Linda Cadwalader, Knox Maddox, and C. K. McIntosh. Mr. and Mrs. Brown left on Saturday morning for their home in Denver. Quite a large assemblage gathered at the ferry to see them off.

Miss Jennie Blair will leave next week for Santa Barbara. Mrs. Blair will spend the summer abroad, leaving next week for New York.

Mr. A. T. Gall of Seattle is registered at the Hotel Argonaut in San Francisco.

Miss Louise Langford will entertain at dinner tomorrow evening at the Hotel Sorrento in honor of Miss Ethel Amann, who is her guest. Covers will be laid for twelve. Mr. Lee Brawley entertained at dinner Thursday evening in Miss Amann's honor at his home on Fourteenth avenue.

Among the permanent guests at the Knickerbocker, Seattle are Miss Josie Brown, Miss Bertha Keast, J. K. Council, J. O. Lamb, Mr. and Mrs. Fred H. Peterson and daughter, H. A. Jargewittz, H. G. Rose, Mr. and Mrs. Percival, Miss Sherlock, Mrs. A. M. Clay, Miss Kassiebaum, Miss Laura W. Turner, J. A. Landrath, E. G. Cook, Joseph Gross and Jerome Wolfe, San Francisco.

The Hotel Carlton, Berkeley, was the scene of a rousing banquet last Wednesday evening, the guests including nearly every debater of any consequence in the University. Several of the old Carnot prize winners were present, and all spoke enthusiastically of California's chances in the coming debate with Stanford.

TO BE ISSUED

Wednesday, March 24th

Will treat, simply and in detail every matter which has to do with dress—not only the gowns of various sorts for different occasions, but wraps, millinery, head and neckwear, shoes, gloves, jewelry and accessories of every sort, how to dress the hair, with some instructions on the delicate care of the skin, etc.—all of those matters in which a little knowledge makes a small amount of time devoted to the toilet amply repay for itself.

Corsets and Underwear

This season's styles in underwear demand a perfectly unbroken and even flowing line from the neck to the knee. The underwear must preserve this line; for even the most studied and elaborate draper cannot conceal the lines beneath.

This year's corsets, for example, are designed to hide the curves of the figure and establish straight lines as a foundation for the dress.

Shirtwaists

There is everything that you want, whether it be long sleeves, short sleeves, high neck, low neck; severe style, elaborate design; dark waists, light ones, and the very popular and useful "guimpe waist," which can be worn with either a tailored suit or the one-piece dress, which is cut low in the neck and has short sleeves.

The shirtwaist subject is almost endless. The Fashion Number of the "Chronicle," March 24th, will be full of helpful suggestions and useful ideas as to the proper waist for the proper time.

Trimmings and Laces

The Fashion Number of the "Chronicle," March 24th, will not only tell you of the great quantities of beautiful trimmings and laces but will help you to use them correctly.

Gowns

With all due regard for Paquin, Worth and the rest of the great artists, you will, after all is said and done, decide upon your own styles; but it will be impossible not to conform more or less to the modes created by those who study every sign in the sky.

This number will be complete and fully illustrated. We have spared no pains or expense to make it not only the most attractive but the most useful number we have ever issued.

Two Concerts

By "Musician"

Advance accounts of the prodigious triumphs of the great Russian pianist, Lhevinne, seem to have been unusually effective, for an exceptionally large audience greeted his first appearance here Sunday afternoon. It was an audience evidently anticipating a concert with an element of the sensational, and prepared to show its demonstrative mood from the very first, although his interpretation of the opening number, the Beethoven "Moonlight" Sonata, was not deeply impressive or noticeably finer or more brilliant than many other readings known here. It seemed lacking in temperamental color, and in the slow movement there was an unevenness which proved the pianist by no means an absolute master of tone production. But with the difficult Schumann "Toccata" came the first of the remarkable achievements of the afternoon and a display of Lhevinne's astounding technic. His programme was evidently compiled with a view towards presenting him as a technician rather than as an emotionalist, and to display the most distinguishing qualities of his virtuosity. These proved to be an extraordinary energy, nerve, force, and endurance, a colossal power of seemingly limitless reserve, and a freedom of wrist which produced octaves of incredible speed and staccato of marvelous lightness, crispness, and rapidity. The Chopin "Etude" in double sixths, which he played with an abandon in defiance of technical difficulties, and the seldom heard B minor octave "Etude," which ended in a tremendous whirlwind, were highly exciting, but the Rubinstein "Staccato Etude" and the stirring "A flat Polonaise" were little short of sensational. The latter he played as only a pianoforte giant could do it. These aroused a storm of applause, to which he responded graciously in the most fascinatingly simple and unaffected manner imaginable, as though he were amused by the enthusiasm occasioned by his tours de force. During the recital he added as encores a Gluck-Brahm's "Gavotte," "Lambourin" by Rameau, and at the end "Etincelles" by Moszkowski. But superb technical mastery did not earn all the applause, though so overwhelming was it sometimes that one momentarily forgot the musicianship and artistic feeling which made the great climaxes with their sonorous fortissimos, never forced into an unmusical quality of tone, their sudden attacks and rapid crescendos of tremendous dramatic significance. The note of poetic emotion and sympathy was not always convincingly sounded; there was a lack of beauty and variety of tone in cantabile passages, and through the neglect of fine nuance in the finish of phrasing, the symmetry of phrase and rythmic shapliness was not always kept. However, the Schubert "Impromptu" in G, the E major "Presto" by Mendelssohn and the "Soiree de Vienne, No. 6," given as an encore, were played with fine sentiment, grace, and delicacy of feeling. Not so convincing were the Liszt "Loreley" and Chopin "Nocturne" in G, which seemed lacking in romantic feeling and sensuousness of tone. Lhevinne's piano playing is unique, and though he is a virtuoso of no uncommon order, the statement of his being entitled to the high rank among living pianists of second only to Rubinstein is hardly justified, at least not by the first recital.

Musicians and music-lovers filled Century Hall Thursday evening when a recital was given by the pianist, Miss Eula Howard. Miss Howard's musical worth and uncommon poetic insight have been unquestionably demonstrated in previous concerts, but the authoritative manner and finish of her playing now prove her another artist placed in the front ranks of pianists by that incomparable master, Hugo Mansfeldt. There was much in her rendering of the masterpieces to delight the most critical, and throughout the recital, the intelligent and close sympathy of the audience was demonstrated by enthusiastic applause. Miss Howard is evidently destined to be distinguished as a Chopin interpreter, her emotional sensibilities fitting especially the moods and imagery of this composer and suffusing her readings of the Chopin numbers with much poetic charm. Adequacy of technic and assurance in the mastery of difficulties enabled her to give of the "Scherzo, E major," and the "A flat Ballade" brilliant and musicianly interpretations. The "Etude op. 25, No. 7," and "Nocturne, F sharp," were given with an expressive rubato, a large singing tone of much warmth of color, and exquisite delicacy in the treatment of detail. Most captivating characteristics of the pianist's style were revealed in the rythmical piquancy of the "Bolero" and the varying phases of charming humor which she read into the "Mazurka, op. 33, No. 4." The last division of the programme contained a hauntingly melodious "Oriental" by Diemer, Liszt's "Liebestraum No. 3," and closed with the brilliant Strauss-Schuett paraphrase of the "Fledermaus Nalzer." The rendition of these strengthened the deep impression already made of the pianist's superior artistry.

Stage

The Right of Way

The dramatic version of Gilbert Parker's great novel, "The Right of Way," differs somewhat from the usual, for while it was originally designed as a vehicle for the co-stars, Guy Standing and Theodore Roberts, Eugene Presbrey has not neglected the minor characters, who are equally distinctive if less important. Among them are the two women who so influence the life of Charley Steele. The first of these is Kathleen, Steele's wife, who has married for wealth and social position while loving another, and is willing to sacrifice her husband's happiness for social advancement. Being a woman of intense pride and little heart, she is incapable of understanding the complexities of the character of the man whom she has married, and instead of leading him to higher, nobler things, she drives him from her to the society of a bar-maid in a low river tavern and to what is believed to be a disgraceful death. The other woman is Rosalie, a simple village girl whose convent education has intensified the natural sweetness of her disposition. She is gentle, religious without bigotry, and when she gives her heart to Steele her soul goes with it. Her love is of the type which passes understanding, for she thinks not at all of herself but only of the good and happiness of the man she loves. The two women do not meet during the course of the play, but the effect of each upon the character of the man who comes under their influence is evident. The company selected by Klaw & Erlanger to support Mr. Standing and Mr. Roberts is of unusual strength.

Airy, Fairy Lillian

No small amount of pleasure is outlined in the announcement that Lillian Russell will be next week's attraction at the Van Ness, where she will be seen for seven evenings and two matinees in her great racing comedy, "Wildfire." This play, from the pens of George Broadhurst and George V. Hobart, has proved the biggest thing the famous American beauty has been identified with. She has met with wonderful receptions ever since the early fall, when she took "Wildfire" into New York and remained there with it for several months. Since then she has visited all the principal cities of the East and now completes her travels with the Pacific Coast. The story deals with a woman who, in settling her husband's estate, finds that about all he has left is a stable of horses. He had conducted it for sport and his connection with it had been kept secret. The widow respects his implied wishes, and while she maps out a campaign on the turf and carries it to a successful end, she, also, keeps the secret of the ownership. This, naturally, involves considerable excitement and a world of comedy is unearthed in the cleverly devised drama of contemporary life. Miss Russell has made a most favorable impression in the central character, and her work has brought her to the front as one of the best American comediennes. She has brought the original New York production to this coast, and a detail which will appeal to the women will be the stunning Directoire gowns worn by the famous beauty. In the supporting company will be found the same people who helped to make the metropolitan run a success, the cast including such favorites as Frank Sheridan, Will Archie, Thurston Hall, Sydney Booth, Joseph Tuohey, Gilbert Douglas, Adolphe Lestina, Franklyn Roberts, Ernest Truex, T. Hayes Hunter, Annie Buckley, Ellen Mortimer and Mary Elizabeth Forbes. Matinees will be given Wednesday and Saturday. Following Lillian Russell, will be seen Klaw and Erlanger's production of "The Right of Way," with Guy Standing and Theodore Roberts.

The Bispham Concert

After an absence of four years or more, that magnificent artist, David Bispham, will make his reappearance on Tuesday evening at Christian Science Hall. As an interpreter of classical and modern songs Mr. Bispham has no living superior. He is far more varied in style than most "lider" singers, owing to his long experience on the operatic stage, where, in certain Wagnerian roles, he never had a peer. The accompanist will be Harold Osborn Smith, whose work with Mr. Bispham when here before is well remembered. The program, which is extremely interesting and varied, is as follows: Old songs —"Where E'er You Walk," Handel; "Behold, Along the Dewy Grass," Haydn; "The Frost Scene," Purcell; "Down Among the Dead Men," old Jacobin song. Songs by classical composers—"Faithful Johnnie," Beethoven; "By Celia's Arbor," Mendelssohn; "When Through the Piazetta" and "Row Gently Here," Schumann; "Maid of Athens," Gounod. Operatic songs—"What Would I Do for My Queen," A. Goring-Thomas; "Ho, Jolly Jenkin" and "The Templar's Song," Arthur Sullivan; "The Mad Dog," Liza Lehman. Modern songs—"To You, Dear Heart," F. Morris Class; "Boat Song," Harriet Ware; "The Pauper's Drive," Sidney Homer; "The Nightingale," Ward Stephens; "The Ballad of Little Billee," Graham Peel. The second and last concert, with an entirely different program, will be given on Sunday afternoon, March 21st. Seats are on sale at Sherman Clay & Co.'s, corner of Kearny and Sutter streets, where the complete program may be obtained. Next Friday afternoon, March 19th, at 3:30, Mr. Bispham will sing at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, and seats for this event may be obtained Monday at the theater box office. An entirely different program has been selected for the Oakland concert. Next Wednesday night Mr. Bispham will furnish the program for the fourth concert of the St. Francis Musical Art Society.

"The Darling of the Gods."

That the Alcazar's greatest achievement has been scored with "The Darling of the Gods" is the opinion of every patron of the Sutter Street playhouse who has witnessed the Belasco-Long drama of old Japan. Pictorially, nothing equal to it has ever been presented in a stock theater anywhere, and histrionically it leaves nothing to be desired, as every one of the players has a role that fits and has had ample time in which to study and rehearse it. That it is even a finer production than the original in which Blanche Bates appeared here about four years ago, is the verdict of many people. And this verdict is not surprising when it is taken into consideration with the fact that David Belasco himself directed two full Alcazar rehearsals and that most of the Alcazar's costumes and properties are absolutely new, having been manufactured right here in San Francisco. Their historical accuracy is evidenced by the eulogistic comment they evoke from scholarly Japanese in the audience. Among the most enthusiastic admirers of the play are the sons and daughters of Nippon. Another week of "The Darling of the Gods" commences next Monday evening, and if box office indications are reliable another series of crowded houses is assured, for the advance demand for seats is unprecedentedly strong. This agreeable state of things finds explanation in the widespread appeal of the play. Its scenic effects charm those who relish having their vision pleased at the theater, and the work of the people in the cast gratifies all admirers of impressive acting. More than 125 people are employed in the production, and in the five acts there are eleven distinct pictures.

The Last of Lhevinne

Joseph Lhevinne, the young Russian pianist, who has proved his right to the title of "the new Rubinstein," bestowed on him by many critics, and who succeeded in working his audiences up to a frenzy of delight last week, will give his final concert this Sunday afternoon at Christian Science Hall, offering a program of unusual interest and variety. The opening number will be Brahms' "Sonata" in F minor, one of the greatest of modern compositions. In contrast, the old classic "Sonata" in F by Scarlatti will follow. Mozart's "Pastorale Varie," Weber's "Momento Capriccioso," Chopin's "Nocturne" in C major and "Polonaise" in F sharp minor, Grieg's "Nocturne" in C major, Poldini's "Marche Mignonne," and Godart's "En Route" will complete the program. Seats will be on sale until five o'clock on Saturday afternoon at Sherman Clay & Co.'s and on Sunday, after ten, at the hall.

College Widow at Ye Liberty

Manager Bishop has one of the most notable attractions he has yet been able to secure for the patrons of Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, to be presented next week at popular prices. "The College Widow" is a play that everyone is familiar with, and there is very little variance in opinion concerning it, the verdict being that it is one of the cleanest, sanest and most wholesomely humorous works for years. It is without doubt the best work of its author, George Ade, and that is saying much. The charm of "The College Widow" lies largely in its distinctive Americanism. Ade tells things that every one knows, and has seen and lived, in simple, graphic, typically American style. The story of the rivalry between the two colleges finds vent in the annual Thanksgiving Day football game, the capture by the "widow" of the other team's star player, and his eventual capture of her. It never grows old, and we laugh as heartily and enjoy it as much today as when it first made its appearance. Although each character in "The College Widow" is a carefully drawn type, and there are nearly twenty of them, the Liberty management, by securing a few players especially for this presentation, are enabled to give the piece an exceptionally fine cast. Landers Stevens will be the football hero, Billy Bolton, and Henry Shumer, his father, the railroad magnate. Isabelle Fletcher will be seen as the widow, Helene Lackaye as the chaperone, and Georgie Cooper as the "prominent waitress," while, through the courtesy of Mr. Walter Hoff Seely of the Valencia Theater, Miss Grace Travers has been secured for the part of the athletic girl, the role in which she scored so heavily in the Valencia's production. George Friend, E. L. Bennison, George Webster, James Corrigan, Elmre Booth, Walter Catlett, John Thorn, Estelle Warfield, and Bessie Sankey complete the cast. Splendid scenic effects have been arranged on the Liberty's big revolving stage. "The College Widow" is announced for one week only, to be followed by "Merely Mary Ann."

"The Burgomaster" at the American

Florence Gear and her clever supporting company will make their final appearances at the American in "Marrying Mary" this Saturday afternoon and evening, and at the Sunday matinée "The Burgomaster," Pixley and Luder's first and most enduring musical comedy, will be revived on a most elaborate scale. The company is headed by Harry Hermsen, who was associated with Kolb and Dill at Fischer's Theater for several seasons in all the notable productions before the fire. He numbers his friends in San Francisco by the hundreds. He will appear as Peter Stuyvesant, governor of New Amsterdam, who sleeps for two hundred years and awakes to find himself in modern New York. The costumes for the revival are all new and are the handsomest, it is said, of any musical comedy now touring. The scenery is also fresh, spick and span, and the entire production is a feast for the eye as well as to the ear. "The Burgomaster" is in a class with "Robin Hood" and "The Prince of Pilsen" for tunefulness. "The Tale of a Kangaroo," "I Love You," the famous Indian chorus, "The Rainy Daisies," and other songs in this piece have a lilt that never fails to send the auditors from the theater whistling merrily. The chorus, which is a very large one, has been selected especially for its singing and dancing ability, and is both good to look upon and pleasant to listen to. "The Gingerbread Man," the great success of last seasan, will follow "The Burgomaster" at the American.

Shakespeare Is Here

William Shakespeare, the great singing master of London, who was the teacher of David Bispham and many other famous artists, has been spending a few months in Southern California. He will shortly return to England, and on his way will spend a few days in San Francisco. The energetic Greenbaum has secured him for two lectures on "The Art of Singing," and for the expenditure of a couple of dollars our local students may obtain about ten times that value of instruction by attending these interesting talks. The dates will be Saturday afternoon, April 3d, and Monday night, April 5th, at

At the Valencia

"Under the Red Robe," Edward Rose's beautiful romantic drama of the time of Cardinal Richelieu, will be played for the last times at the Valencia Theater Saturday and Sunday afternoons and evenings, and on Monday night "Out of the Fold," a pastoral comedy-melodrama by Langdon McCormack, will be presented for the first time in San Francisco. "Out of the Fold" is a play that with deep sentiment and with a rural environment presents a story of the simple kind that reaches the heart and abounds in characters of a comedy kind who offer relief to the serious sides of the drama. The story, in short, is that of Helene Grey, who, some time in the past, has loved not wisely but too well, and has sought a haven in the quiet village in which the action of the play is located. Once there she is loved by Nolan Crane, the schoolmaster, and worshipped from afar by "Big Jim," a sheep herder. Neither of the men knows of her past until young John Lathrop, just from college, finds Helene among his people and recognizes in her the girl who has been associated with one of his friends. He is not slow to tell what he knows and the tongues of the village gossips begin to wag. It is then, when even the mind of Nolan Crane has been poisoned against the girl, that "Big Jim," faithful as one of his own sheep dogs, takes the wanderer under his protection and stands between her and all of her detractors. Though his own love for the girl is deep, he recognizes that he would not make her happy, and it becomes his own wish to bring the "lost lamb" back into the fold, and in the end Nolan Crane's nobility of character and love for Helene bring him back to her and they are united.

Princess Theater

George Ade's merry musical jest, "The Sultan of Sulu," will be most elaborately and picturesquely presented next Monday night at the Princess. The cast will be of exceptional merit. Frank Moulan will be seen as Ki-Ram, Sultan of Sulu, which he originated in the original presentation of the piece and which won for him a national reputation. May Boley as Pamela Frances Jackson, the judge advocate, will have a most congenial role. "The Rounders" will be played for the last times this Sunday afternoon and evening.

Orpheum Vaudeville

A particularly novel and entertaining programme is announced for next week at the Orpheum. It will be headed by the Eight Palace Girls who for several seasons were a great sensation at the Palace Theater, London. They are said to be very attractive girls. They excel as singers and dancers. Associated with them is James Clemmons, a very agile and original eccentric dancer. Ray L. Royce, who is well remembered as a talented character delineator, will offer an amusing monologue in which he impersonates quite a variety of types of rural folk. James McDonald and Valerie Huntington, clever singers and dancers, are heralded as artists of the highest class. Their repertoire varies from American ragtime to Killarney love ditties and one of their greatest hits is an American character song with McDonald as a newsboy and Miss Huntington as his best girl. The Blessings, who bring with them the reputation of being the cleverest equilibrists and head-and-hand balancers on the German stage, will make their first appearance. Madame Blessingg is considered the most beautiful woman that ever appeared in the Berlin music halls. Next week concludes the engagement of Six Little Girls and a Teddy Bear, the Kitabanzai Troupe, G. Herbert Mitchell and Emma Rainey and the full-blooded Indians from the Shoshone Reservation in "A Modern Pocahontas." A new and interesting series of motion pictures will be a pleasant finale to the entertainment.

"The Honor of the Family" as played by Otis Skinner, is said to be even a greater success than that actor's production of "The Duel" which San Franciscans enjoyed so much last season.

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

SUGGESTIONS IN JEWELRY SUITABLE FOR THE TIMES.

For Day and Evening Wear

Since the wearing of jeweled studs, links, and even waistcoat buttons with full evening dress has come into such general vogue that one can find them in most exclusive furnishing shops, it is hardly necessary to expend a great deal of money for these articles as in former times. While there are some individuals who by reason of a certain natural air or style can wear more extreme cuts, more striking patterns and bright colors in clothes and haberdashery than others. It is seldom that vulgar taste or flashy ostentation in jewelry can by any natural or acquired distinction in dress be made to look other than vulgar or showy, and although it is somewhat difficult to define the exact limit to which one may go without crossing the border line of refinement, some general comment may be helpful, and the illustrations below may be interesting as giving an idea of the character of designs of good style shown at leading jewelers.

Link Set and Scarf Pin, Jade Stone Set in Gold.

It is not extravagance, as judged by actual money outlay or value, that determines good form; on the contrary, in the majority of cases, quite the reverse. Simplicity is the most important thing men should look out for in selection, whether expensive simplicity or not. The main consideration, however, should always be that there is a harmony in quality in one's attire, so there may not be a noticeable difference in one's attire and jewelry, making practical the saying, "Consistency, thou art a jewel."

For day wear cuff links and pins to match of jade, agate, coral, or some precious stones in colors to match the shirt they are worn with, are very much in fashion at present. A particularly pretty set is shown in a photograph reproduced below. It shows an example of dark green stones (presumably jade) set in fairly heavy rims of gold, and there are a number of other pretty designs in various shapes and colors, many of which may be matched in scarf pins.

By Vitellius' orders I was forced to send the image back to Cæsarea. Surely I did not merit that disgrace. In the presence of the immortal gods I swear that not once in my government did I offend justice and the laws. But I am old. My enemies and accusers are dead. I shall die unavenged. Who will defend my memory?" He groaned and relapsed into silence.

"It is wise neither to fear nor to hope anything from an uncertain future," answered Lamia. "What matters men's opinion of us? We have only ourselves for witnesses and judges. Console yourself, Pontius, with the testimony you render to your own rectitude, and be content with your own esteem and that of your friends. For the rest, nations cannot be governed solely by gentle measures. The love for the human race which philosophy counsels has little share in the deeds of public men."

"Let us drop the subject," said Pontius. "The sulphur which exhales from the fields has greater power when it comes from earth still heated by the sunbeams. I must hasten. Farewell. But since I have found a friend, I wish to profit by my good fortune. Do me the favor of supping with me to-morrow. My house is on the seashore at the end of the village, close by Misenium. You will easily recognize it by the portico, in which is a painting representing Orpheus charming the lions and tigers by the notes of his lyre. To-morrow, Lamia," he added, as he entered his litter, "to-morrow we will talk of Judæa."

The following day Lamia went at the appointed hour to the house of Pontius Pilate. Only two couches awaited the guest.

Served without ostentation, but well, the board bore silver dishes in which were larks dressed with honey, thrushes, oysters from Lucrinus and Sicilian lampreys.

As they ate, Pontius and Lamia questioned each other concerning their maladies, whose symptoms they described at length, and spoke of various remedies which had been recommended. Then, congratulating themselves on having met at Baiæ, they vied in praising the beauty of the shore and the freshness of the air. Lamia extolled the grace of the women passing along the beach, loaded with ornaments and wearing veils embroidered by the barbarians. But the old governor deplored an ostentation which, for the sake of useless gems and spider-web fabrics woven by the hand of man, lavished Roman money among foreign nations, and even among the enemies of the empire. Then they talked of the great works completed in the country, the immense bridge built by Caius between Puteoli and Baiæ, and the canals dug by Augustus to convey sea water to the lakes Avernus and Lucrine.

"I too," said Pontius, sighing, "wished to undertake great works for the benefit of the public. When I received, to my misfortune, the appointment of Governor to Judæa, I traced the plan of an aqueduct two hundred stadia long, which was to bring an abundance of pure water into Jerusalem. The height of the levels, the capacity of the modules, the obliquity of the brass chalices to which the distribution pipes were fitted, had all been studied, and with the advice of engineers determined. I was preparing for the police certain regulations to prevent individuals from obtaining an illegal share of the water. The architects and laborers were engaged. I ordered the work to be commenced. But, far from seeing with pleasure the construction of the mighty arches over which health was to be brought with the pure water into their city, the Hierosolymites uttered piteous lamentations. Mobs gathered, crying out against sacrilege and impiety, attacked the workmen and scattered the foundation stones. Can you imagine greater barbarism, Lamia? Yet Vitellius took their part, and I received orders to stop the work."

"It is a grave question," replied Lamia, "to know whether we ought to make men happy against their will."

Pontius Pilate continued as if he had not heard him.

"To refuse an aqueduct, what madness! But everything which comes from the Romans is hateful to the Jews. To them we are impure beings, and our mere presence is in their eyes a profanation. They never dared to enter the Prætorium from fear of defiling themselves, and I was compelled to administer the government in a tribunal in the open air, upon the marble pavement which your foot so often trod."

"The Jews," said Lamia, "are strongly attached to their ancient customs. They suspected you, though without cause, I admit, of wishing to abolish their laws and change their customs. Permit me, Pontius, to tell you that you did not always act in a manner calculated to dispel this error. You found pleasure in rousing their fears, and I have seen you more than once betray in their presence the scorn with which their beliefs and religious ceremonies inspired you. You irritated them especially by having the high priest's robes and sacerdotal ornaments guarded by legionaries in the Antonia fortress. We should recognize the fact that though not reared, like us, in the contemplation of sacred things, the Jews celebrate mysteries whose antiquity renders them worthy of reverence."

Pontius Pilate shrugged his shoulders. "They have no definite knowledge of the nature of the gods," he replied. "They worship Jupiter, but without giving him either name or face. They do not even revere him under the form of a stone, like certain Asiatic nations. They know nothing of Apollo, Neptune, Mars, Pluto, or of any goddess. Yet I believe that they formerly worshipped Venus for, even at the present day, women offer doves, and you know as well as I that traders in the porticoes of the temple sold these birds in pairs for sacrifice. I was even told that one day some madman upset these venders of sacrifices with their cages, and the priests complained of if as sacrilege. I don't know the result of the affair, which, as you may suppose, interested me very little. But I think that custom of sacrificing doves was instituted in honor of Venus. Why do you laugh, Lamia?"

"I am laughing," answered Lamia, "at a comical idea which, I know not how, darted through my mind. I was thinking that some day the Jupiter of the Jews might come to Rome and pursue you with his hatred. Why not? Asia and Africa have already given us numerous gods. We have beheld temples erected in Rome to Isis and Anubis. Tremble, Pontius, lest the invisible Jupiter of the Jews should disembark some day at Ostia!"

At the suggestion that a god might come from Judæa, a smile flitted over the stern features of the Roman governor. Then he answered gravely:

"How could the Jews impose their sacred law upon foreign nations, when they differ so widely concerning its interpretation among themselves? Divided into twenty rival sects, you have seen them, Lamia, in public places shaking their rolls of sacred writings, vituperating one another and tearing one another by the beard. You have seen them in the courts of the temple rending their dirty robes in token of lamentation around some unfortunate wretch who was a victim to prophetic delirium. They cannot imagine how people can discuss serenely and peacefully those divine things which are veiled and full of uncertainty. The nature of the immortals is concealed from us, we cannot know it. I deem it wise to trust in the providence of the gods. But the Jews have no philosophy and will tolerate no diversity of opinion. On the contrary, they deem those who hold views concerning the deity which are opposed to theirs worthy of the severest torture. A hundred times I have seen throngs of rich and poor gathered around their priests, furiously besieging my ivory chair, and plucking at the borders of my toga, the lacing of my sandals, to extort from me the death sentence of some poor wretch whose crime I could not discover, and who merely seemed to me as mad as his accusers. What do I say: a hundred times! Why, it was every day, every hour! Yet it was my duty to execute their laws as heedfully as our own, since Rome did not appoint me the destroyer, but the support of their customs."

Lamia tried to turn the conversation into a pleasanter channel.

"Pontius," he began, "I can easily understand your old resentment and your dark forebodings. You have known the character of the Jews thoroughly, and it has not been to their advantage. But I, who resided in Jerusalem as a curious stranger and mingled with the people, discovered in these men virtues concealed from you. But I confess that I never felt any deep sympathy for the Jews. The Jewesses, on the contrary, pleased me greatly. I was a young man in those days, and the Syrian women charmed me. Their red lips, sparkling dark eyes and lingering glances thrilled every nerve."

Pontius listened to these praises impatiently. "I was not the man to fall into the snares of the Jewish women," he said, "and since you lead me to say it, Lamia, I have never approved your dissolute manners. If I did not tell you formerly that I deemed you very guilty for having carried on an intrigue with the wife of a Roman consul, it was because I thought you were severely expiating your fault. Marriage among patrician families is sacred, it is the institution on which Rome rests. As to slave women and foreigners, relations formed with them are of little consequence. What I blame you for specially, Lamia, is that you did not marry and give children to the State, as is the duty of every worthy citizen."

But the man whom Tiberius had exiled was not listening to his host. Having drained his goblet of Falernian wine, he sat smiling at some invisible image.

After a moment's silence he continued in a very low voice which gradually rose:

"Those Syrian women danced so languidly! I knew a Jewess in Jerusalem who danced in a tavern on a shabby rug, by the light of a little smoky lamp, raising her arms to clash her cymbals. Her swaying figure, her head thrown back as if weighed down by the heavy masses of her red hair, her glowing, languishing eyes and supple movements would have made Cleopatra herself turn pale with envy. I was charmed with her barbaric dances, her song, the odor of incense which surrounded her, the half slumber in which she seemed to live. I followed her everywhere, mingling with the vile rabble of soldiers, jugglers and publicans by whom she was surrounded. One day she disappeared and I never saw her again. I sought her a long time in doubtful haunts and taverns. It was as hard to give her up as to do without Greek wine. A few months after I lost sight of her, I chanced to learn that she had joined a little band of men and women who were following a young Galilean thaumaturgus. His name was Jesus; he came from Nazareth and was crucified for some crime. Do you remember him, Pontius?"

Pontius Pilate frowned and raised his hand to his brow like a person who is searching his memory. Then after a few minutes' silence he murmured:

"Jesus? Jesus of Nazareth? I do not recollect."

Auto Notes

Frank H. Collins, of the Pioneer Automobile Company, left yesterday for Butte, Montana, where he will drive a Thomas Flyer for one of the most prominent motorists of Montana. Tours to California and the Alaska-Yukon Exposition will be among the trips taken by Collins this season.

The Diamond Rubber Company is just in receipt of a letter from McClay & Black reporting on their several cars in the rent service in Los Angeles, and to which is attached a statement of the mileage had from Diamond tires during the past several months. It is interesting to note along the line of advancement in the quality of tires that the 15 Diamond Mountain Tread Casings used on these machines had given an average of nearly 6000 miles each.

"Oakland offers prospective automobile owners more opportunities for learning just what they have a right to expect from a good automobile than any of the other cities about the bay," says W. L. Loos, the Oakland agent for the Studebaker E-M-F "30" car. "Here we have hills of all kinds and roads that are good and bad, paved and unpaved, stretches of road whereon we can speed, and taken all together, San Francisco with her parks and driveways does not stand comparison when it comes to thoroughly enjoying the pleasures that can be obtained by automobiling. As an indication of this, one needs but to mention the fact that San Francisco's automobile enthusiasts usually come over to Alameda County on Sundays to get the most out of their cars."

At last the roads to San Jose are in condition for touring. W. L. Growall and party made the century run from this city to San Jose and return in their Chalmers-Detroit and report the roads in fine shape. "I did not expect to find anything but mud," said Growall, "but with the exception of a short distance outside the city, the roads are fine."

Twenty-three people up the famous Fillmore Street hill in a Thomas Flyer was the feat accomplished the other day by Calvin C. Eib of the Pioneer Automobile Company. The possibilities of the modern automobile were never more thoroughly demonstrated than when Eib, accompanied by twenty-two passengers, standing on the running boards, astride the hood and hanging on to the sides of the tonneau, made the famous hill where the electric cars are taken up and down by cable. The test was the result of a discussion among several automobile men as to the possibilities for hill climbing of the highest power touring car on the market. Calvin C. Eib, one of the best known and most dare-devil drivers on the Coast, agreed to take as many people as could be put on the six-cylinder Thomas, and take them up the steepest hill to be found in the city. The passengers for the test consisted of drivers, newspaper men and expert automobile mechanics, and it was apparent that these experienced motorists viewed the three blocks 34 per cent grade from Union Street to Broadway with some misgivings as to the outcome of the climbing test. The fact of an automobile going up the famous hill always attracts a great deal of attention, and when the load in Jack Costello's six-cylinder Thomas car joined the already crowded machine of which Calvin Eib was at the wheel, the interst was intense, wagers being made by spectators that the car would never do it, and others that the machine would not go more than half a block. Filing the whole of the skiddoo number wherever they could hang on, Eib gave the big six the throttle and the speed monster began the ascent easily at first, then with more and more speed as the throttle was opened wider. Never halting for the first part of the hill, Eib turned the big motor loose on the last ascent and the car shot up to the summit with as little effort and with much more confidence than the 23 occupants of the machine.

Women have played a conspicuous part in the development of the automobile, according to the leading automobile houses of the country, and many manufacturers regard them as having offered a very potent helping hand in the building of limousines and laundelets and more recently the town cars and the taxicabs. "The feminine side of the house quickly learned that someone had carried the motor industry far away from the days when her chief interest in the business was a great concern as to the safety of her husband or brother who had taken a hand in the new sport," says Chester N. Weaver, manager for the local Studebaker branch. "Today she is seriously interested in design, coloring and upholstering o the car with which she does her shopping, makes her calls, and utilizes probably five evenings out of the week. This demand is being met by the American manufacturer, some actually making all types of cars to their customers' orders. This is especially true of the Studebaker organization which is fast occupying as prominent a place in the motoring field as it has for years in the carriage industry."

J. S. Seller returned yesterday from a trip to Livermore in his 20-horsepower Baby Oldsmobile tourning car. Seller says the roads over the Doublin grade are much better than the Niles Canyon, which is hub deep with mud.

bales the previous year. These figures were lost sight of for the moment, however, by the weak longs in October who made a rush to get out of their cotton at the first signs of rain, and the end of the week showed prices weak at a decline of from 15 to 20 points under high levels reached the first of the week. The statistical condition is growing stronger every day and the market is ieft in a much better technical position since the recent liquidation, and no doubt a considerable short interest exists, which will sooner or later be forced to cover at higher prices

According to Secretary Hester of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, the movement to market during the month of February was 1,001,000 bales compared to 980,000 bales last year and 1,229,000 bales year before last, and as the following will show, even if the commercial crop be 13,500,000 bales, the amount to come forward could hardly be larger than amount marketed after this date in 1908 and 1907, especially since Southern mills have probably taken proportionately more than allowed to date, when compared with one year ago and year before last.

Stocks at all United States ports is nearly as low as it was one year ago, 769,000 against 651,000, and is about 300,000 less than year before last; therefore, there is no great weight of cotton on the market in America where trade in textiles is at its best, and if a scale should develop over the unfavorable prospects in Texas, owing to the absence of rain in the western part of that State some old-time activity might be experienced. New England is doing a flourishing business according to returns. Thirty-four corporations have declared an average dividend of 2.71 per cent for the first quarter of the year compared with 2.27 per cent last year and 2.70 per cent in 1907, when prosperity was so much in evidence.

Some rains were reported in Texas over Saturday and Sunday, and Dallas and Waco report rain Monday morning, but instead of the market declining as many had predicted a ten point advance occurred, which goes to show that no decline of consequence from present levels need be looked for. Cotton should be bought on all easy periods.

In the Limelight

When the great Russian actress, Madame Alla Nazimova appears at the Van Ness Theatre next month she will bring with her the entire New York supporting company as seen in her productions of "Comtesse Coquette," "A Doll's House," and "Hedda Gabler."

Musical and comic opera managers are constantly recruiting their companies from the ranks of the vaudevilles. McIntyre and Heath, Ward and Vokes, George Cohan, Mabel Hite, Richard Carle, Eddie Foy, George Primrose, DeWolf Hooper, Frank Daniels and many more stage celebrities were formerly vaudevillians. And now Manager Wm. P. Cullen has induced the famous Lockhart sisters to leave the vaudeville stage and join "The Burgomaster," that always popular musical comedy which comes to the American Theatre for one week beginning this Sunday afternoon.

"Peter Pan," the Coast rights of which were purchased by Walter Hoff Seely, of the Valencia Theatre, and Oliver Morosco, of the Burbank, Los Angeles, is continuing to pack the latter theatre to the doors at every performance and seats are selling weeks in advance. The initial production by a stock company in this city of Barrie's beautiful fantasy will take place on the afternoon of Easter Sunday.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Unitarian: No, Dr. Rader didn't get Dr. Hemphill's job. He missed it by twenty-five hundred dollars.

Commuter: No, you are mistaken; this is a reform administration at the City Hall. That is why so many bold things are being done with impunity. In the days of Chris Buckley it took ten years to get away with a million dollars' worth of graft on the City Hall, but now with reformers on the job—well, you know what's doing.

Berkeley Professor: Yes, Speaker Stanton is a great patriot. That is evident from his impassioned utterances whenever he feels that it is up to him to affirm his loyalty to the interest of the dear pee-pul. I cannot authoritatively inform you whether it is Governor or United States Senator he wishes to be. I must decline to tell you what job I think he measures up—or rather down to.

Old Subscriber: Yes, the insurance compact has maintained a lobby at Sacramento for many years and the insurance men have spent money to defeat legislation at Sacramento, but the man you mention knew nothing about it. He is blissfully ignorant of such things. That's why he is such a hot reformer and wants to send people to jail.

Yahoo: No, I don't know anything about the differences between Patrick Calhoun and his sister. I have not the space to devote to the history of the differences between Rudolph Spreckels and his father. Read the back files of the dailies.

A MEMORY.

A dainty foot and daintily booted;
A flying shoe-string and much ado;
A suspicion of whiteness, befrilled and befluted;
Then I knelt to fasten a dear little shoe.

An ankle more shapely had none of the Graces
Than that which was slightly exposed to my view,
And somehow my heart was caught in the laces,
When I knelt to fasten that dear little shoe.

Far away in my dreams I kneel at her feet,
With avowal of passion, deep, earnest and true;
My heart is still held in imprisonment sweet—
Still held by the knot on that dear little shoe.

And all that sort of stuff.
Meanwhile the editor, aghast,
Cries out: "Hold, that's enough!"

Our Extravagant City Government

The Labor Council reports, after an investigation of the present administration of municipal affairs, that it is very extravagant. This interesting report the Chronicle does not take seriously for the reason that the men by whom it was made are politicians of the Labor Party. Here we find the old, familiar question of motive raised once more. "An investigation by members of the Union Labor Party," says the Chronicle, "is, of course, precisely like the investigation of a Republican administration by a body of Democrats." This is quite true. But a partisan report is not to be scoffed at merely because it is partisan. The security of this government depends in a measure on partisanship. It is because we can rely more or less on the disposition of the "ins" to strive for a record which cannot be impeached by the "outs" that our government is no worse than it is. Instead of sneering at the report of the Labor Council committee the Chronicle should investigate with the purpose of finding out whether the complaints that are made are justifiable. It should not be governed in so important a matter by sympathies growing out of the good fellowship that pervades the Commonwealth Club. Apparently the Chronicle assumes that the report exhibits prima facie evidence of its worthlessness inasmuch as it protests against the use of an automobile by Mayor Taylor but is silent with respect to the use of an automobile by Mayor Schmitz. This is a sophism which is hardly subtle enough to deceive. The purpose of the investigation conducted by the Labor Council was not to prove that Schmitz had established a standard of right conduct in the management of municipal affairs but rather to show that under the current dispensation the taxpayers are not getting "a run for their money." The fact is that when the licentious Schmitz indulged in the luxury of an automobile at the expense of the taxpayers he excited much indigation notwithstanding the fact that at that time the people were pretty well inured to extravagance and corruption. When the Hon. Edward Robson Taylor was elected to office, despite the widespread knowledge of his poetic temperament, his taste for flowery fields, poetic cavortings and all the Elysian delights, it was believed that though responsible mainly to genius and art he was nevertheless a practical man, animated by a desire to abate extravagance in municipal affairs and resolved to win approbation by prudent and economical management. Nobody believed that the Hon. E. Robson Taylor would aerate himself at the public expense in a gasoline wagon. Much less did anybody surmise that he would set an example in extravagance; that by way of justifying his own auto he would surround himself with a motor cabinet, saturate the city government with gasoline, and leave to posterity the unpleasant memory of what shall be known as the Automobile Administration.

Time to "Go Slow"

About the time that the Chronicle's editorial writer was scoffing at the report of the Labor Council committee, Supervisor Giannini, chairman of the Public Utilities committee was informing some of our leading citizens that we shall have to go slow in incurring indebtedness for purposes not vitally essential. This is the first suggestion that we have heard of its being advisable to call a halt. The fact is we have been going at a pretty fast clip. We are under a prodigious bonded debt, and there is much agitation in favor of piling on the agony. If the gentlemen who are now conducting our municipal affairs are indulged in all their whims it will not be long before no man of small means will dare to incur the risk of owning a home. We are glad to know that Supervisor Giannini is in favor of "going slow," and we are sorry that the advisability of calling a halt had not occurred to him sooner. Perhaps if he had been conscious of the seriousness of the situation some weeks ago he would not have been in favor of paying nearly half a million dollars for the garbage crematory franchise.

Furuseth Saved by a Technicality

A decision of peculiar interest at this time, and which is deserving of public attention on account of the extraordinary principles that are being advocated by some of our zealous reformers, was rendered a few weeks ago in the case of the Hammond Lumber Company against Andrew Furuseth and several other representatives of the Sailors' Union. This case grew out of the usual controversy between capital and labor. The defendants were charged with the violation of an injunction, and the court was asked to punish them for contempt. In order to make out a case against the defendants it was necessary to introduce in evidence a deposition which had been made by Furuseth in a civil action in which he made certain admissions, which, in the contempt case, would be conclusive of his guilt. Furuseth and his co-defendants objected to the introduction of this deposition. The objection was grounded in a technicality. Nowadays there is a great prejudice against technicalities. This prejudice is very strong among Mr. Furuseth's friends, but in this case a technicality kept the illustrious labor leader out of jail. Judge Van Fleet held that the deposition was inadmissible because contempt proceedings are in their nature criminal, and to permit the introduction of the deposition would be equivalent to compelling Furuseth to testify against himself. The attorney for the Hammond Lumber Company argued that it would be a reproach to the law if the defendants were permitted to escape punishment for the grievous wrongs complained of "through an objection so largely in the nature of a technicality." Judge Van Fleet, who, apparently, differs somewhat in temperament as well as in his attitude toward the law from such eminent jurists as Lawlor and Dunne, said of this argument: "It does not address itself to my kindly consideration." He added:

> Being a part of the law the court is as much bound to observe it while it remains on the statute book as any other rule made for its guidance, however substantial and elementary. The function of the court is to apply the law, not to make it; to enforce it rather than break it. The wisdom of the ages has demonstrated the necessity of surrounding the administration of justice with certain fixed rules and limitations, to avoid the personal equation of the mere will or desire of the individual, which always tends to wrong and oppression. These rules are prescribed for the protection of society itself; and, not infrequently, serve to protect it against itself. They are for the benefit of every man who comes before the court—the guilty and the innocent alike; for it is only by their impartial application that the question of guilt or innocence may be safely reached in any case, and the defendant justly said to have had a fair trial. These rules are not therefore, to be ignored, for, if they may be disregarded today for a good end, they may be as readily disregarded tomorrow for a bad one. There is but one course open to a court, and that, to apply the prescribed rules of law undeviatingly as it finds them; and the judge who, in the supposed interest of justice in a particular case, undertakes to set them at naught abdicates his sworn judicial function and becomes the abettor of the mob—the only tribunal that may presume to administer its justice untrammelled by the restraint of law.

If we were not fearful of wounding tender sensibilities we should suggest that the foregoing sentiments be engrossed and framed and posted in a conspicuous place in certain court-rooms that are not within the jurisdiction of the Federal government.

An Awful Fate

Knowing that as a rule we intrust the management of our political affairs to persons to whom no one would willingly intrust the management of his private concerns we realize that there should be general rejoicing whenever the members of the Legislature come to the end of their official tether and are shorn of their power of mischief. Yet the adjournment of a legislature never moves us to jubilation. We are never inclined to exult at the dismal prospect which is faced by men who have been bathing in the limelight and playing with gratification the fantastic tricks that make countless angels weep. We have reference to the prospect of passing the remainder of their days in the recesses of deep obscurity, which is the fate of the average mediocrity upon whom the official limelight has played at a State capital. There is something in the atmosphere of a legislature which acts on the men who generate it like a drug that makes slaves of those that take it into their system. It has been said that once a member of the legislature, always a member; which means that a man who has served the people as an assemblyman or a State senator is usually doomed to spend the rest of his days living over the experience of the few months of his statesmanship, ever longing to be reinvested with a little brief authority, and making of himself an insufferable bore by his habit of harking back to the days of his imaginary importance. One of the old philosophers has said that few of us can ever endure to think of being twice the same men upon earth and that some had rather never have lived than tread over their days once more. But ex-assemblymen and ex-senators find it something like hell to endure denial of the ineffable joy of uttering themselves to the walls that once echoed to their near oratory. It is supposed that there can be no greater happiness than to look back on a life usefully and virtuously employed, and no greater misery than to be reminded of days misspent, but the statesman whose career petered out at the end of a session of the legislature harks back to the period of his ephemeral prominence with mixed emotions; without repentance but with anguish born of a feverish craving that consumes his vitals. The penalty of his misdeed is his inability to enter the bowers of ease and repose in the shade of obsurity.

By Way of Eulogy

Of course all legislators do not end their political career at the close of a session. Men of the type of the Hon. Grove L. Johnson and the Hon. Edward Wolfe are deft enough in politics to gratify their consuming passion. Besides they are men of ability. Speaker Stanton, like Cataline, goes but to return, and as for the Hon. Arlecchino Caminetti, he is one of the few statesmen whose good fortune it is to be of perennial effervescence. And deservedly so. We hold Mr. Caminetti in such high esteem that we feel we should be untrue to our readers were we to permit the legislature which is now on its last legs to die a natural death without celebrating his talents. This legislature has devoted to the cause of the people intense cerebration which has resulted in much mental brillancy, but of all the statesmen that compose this superb deliberative body we do not know of one who deserves to rank with the Hon. Arlecchino Caminetti for undeviating and inflexible fidelity to the masses. Stanton and Drew won more or less renown by their repeated affirmation of their unerring responsiveness to the voice of their constituents as well as by their becoming and ostentatious eagerness to comply with the demands of the palladium of our liberty. Drew was perhaps the most stentorian of all the friends of the people. He wished it to be understood at all hours that he did not consider that he had been sent to tne legislature to exercise his best judgment but rather to execute the wishes of the people. Stanton was partial to his constituents of Los Angeles. For them he would go the distance. It has been said that it is absurd to seek the approbation of the mob, it is so seldom right in its judgment, but our illustrious statesmen, in touch as they are with the spirit of the times, are sensible of the paramount importance of popular approval. Macaulay tells us that in every age the vilest specimens of human nature are to be found among demagogues, but the great essayist had no prescience of this age or of the men that are contributing to its gaiety and its perplexities. What he regarded as demagogues are nowadays justly recognized as virtuous and aggressive civic patriots, zealous friends of the people; in short, Caminettis. Nowadays it is to a man's credit to serve the people as they want to be served, not as he may think it is to their best interest to be served. And of this type of statesmen there is none to compare with Caminetti.

A Pet of the Gallery

The statesman from Amador is the incarnation of patriotism. A great record has he made during the session which is now drawing to a close. Though Drew and Stanton frequently affirmed their loyalty to the people, nobody listened to them when the great Tribune from Amador unlatched his chin and began to roar. Everybody paid deference to Caminetti's superior ecstasies; the gallery approved his most tempestuous appeals, and not one of his purposes did anybody failed to laud. The fact is that everybody recognized in Caminetti a statesman true to his principles. The Stantons and Drews are Republicans, who, while affecting to be guided by Republican doctrine are in reality catering to the perverted taste of the democratic mob, but Caminetti is a prophet of democracy, a disciple of the great tribune of Nebraska who demands that the people shall rule in the sense that they shall be free to follow the dictates of their ignorance, their passions and their prejudices; that they shall rule blindly when they are blind, and, if they feel like it, to their own undoing. Hence when the Hon. Arlecchino Caminetti took the floor and advocated direct legislation he was logical as well as vehement. Moreover he was consistent. True, he was playing to the gallery. But why not? Playing to the gallery is precisely the function of the twentieth century Democrat. It is the Republican, not the Democrat, that dissembles when he plays to the gallery. The only justifiable animadversion that can be passed on Mr. Caminetti is that he neglected his opportunities. Great among his contemporaries he does not bulk large in comparison with the tribunes of old, who were as remarkable for their imagination as for their enthusiasm. When they played to the gallery they had something more than political power to offer. At times they favored the distribution of land to the multitude. At times they favored the exemption of the mob from taxation. Think of what Senator Caminetti might have done along these lines. Aside from evincing a desire to cheapen transportation he proposed no measure designed to enrich the plain people. In one of the Eastern states a zealous tribune has proposed to outlaw notes given for articles sold by trusts. State pensions for the unemployed have been proposed. Yet the unimaginative Caminetti could evolve no scheme for bestowing special privileges or favors on either farmers or laborers. Therefore, we say he neglected his opportunities. However he made it clear that his great heart burns with sympathy for the masses and hostility to soulless corporations. Whenever he yawps railroad stockholders break out with goose-flesh. The state should find much that is fascinating in this Iroquois brave. In these piping times of plutocratic deviltry it is a consolation and a moral strengthening to feel that whatever dangers menace the poor, downtrodden and almost helpless plain people, whatever tyranny threatens to seize and crush his beloved constituency Mr. Caminetti stands ready to go to the front and sacrifice himself in public office. With his genius for devising ways and means of thwarting the rapacious money-power, with his command of the finest moral platitudes and his unfaltering adherence to the good and the true he is entitled to rank as a statesman with either one of the Gracchi, of whom, by the way, he is perhaps a direct decendant.

On the Ghost Trail

A new Society of Psychical Research has filed articles of incorporation for the usual purpose of making an investigation into stories of supernatural happenings and communications from the other world. There has been an awakening of interest in the subject of psychic phenomena within the past few years, and probably for the time being the question of spooks and spookery will cast the pastime of muckraking into the shade. There was,—probably still is,—in England a flourishing association of investigators, of which Andrew Lang was one of the most interested and enthusiastic. Hamlin Garland was for years the secretary of a body of ghost-hunters in the East, and men and women of prominence in every walk of life have been identified with psychical societies. But belief in social intimacy with spirits continues to be more in the nature of a state of mind than the result of demonstration. A noted British scientist recently asserted that he had been convinced by evidence of the most satisfactory character, but when he revealed the evidence that had brought conviction to him it provoked the skeptical to laughter. The incident has served to bear out what has so often been said by theologists, that faith exercises as much influence in science as it does in religion.

The White Plague

Medical societies and professional philanthropists have taken fresh interest in the "white plague," and they are spreading terror with renewed vim. As a result consumptive tendencies are observed where none exists, and fear of contamination has resulted in numerous displays of man's inhumanity to man. Men are refused employment because of trivial throat affections; school boards have passed laws excluding children from families in which a case of consumption has developed; teachers have been barred for living under the same roof with a person under suspicion, and consumptive patients have been neglected because of fear inspired by the disease. It is of course advisable to take precautions against disease, but it is somewhat singular that we should so strenuously strive to abate the white plague and make no effort to retard the spread of other diseases that are equally to be dreaded. There were more deaths from heart disease in January than from consumption. Diseases of the heart are increasing rapidly, a fact that is attributed to the intensity of the life we are living. In the mad pursuit of money, going a pace as we are that is literally taking the heart out of us, peace is having her victims as numerous as those of war. Heart disease is not contagious, but the commercial craze which produces it is a malady that can be counteracted. A people can be educated up to the joys of a leisure, as well as of a strenuous, life. But, as we were saying, consumption is not the only disease to be dreaded. Cancer is spreading so rapidly that it is causing alarm all over the civilized world. And then there is the measles, that old familiar disease of our childhood, which some people regard as one of the inevitable trivialities of life. Measles is in reality a disease greatly to be dreaded on account of its tendency to deafness, blindness, and weak lungs. During a recent epidemic in New York forty per cent of the cases proved fatal. An epidemic which raged in the South Seas a few years ago communicated from a ship which came into port with a case, almost depopulated some of the islands. The truth about consumption is that, until recently families rather took a pride in their hereditary disease. Not having estates to bequeath or high lineage to brag about, they fell back on what they had, and made no effort whatever to stem its ravages or prevent its perpetuation. It was in a way a sort of distinction, and "going into a decline," whatever its eventual disadvantages, was for the present an interesting experience. The member of a family who escaped the doom was something of a renegade, for since death was inevitable, it would at least be showing a proper regard for tradition to conform to the common custom.

She Sings

The keyboard old, where slim hands wander white,
Through twilight pink and gray gleams strangely strong;
Note after note, like fluttering wings, takes flight
And, straying, forms a pensive little song,
Discreet, remote, enchanting, too, but slight,
About the room where perfumes of Her throng.
What is this sudden stillness cradling me
To that faint ballad's dream-like ebb and flow?
What would'st thou have of me, dim melody?
Musical ghost, what is it thou would'st know—
Thou at the window by the garden tree,
Wavering, fading, ever loath to go?

Perspective Impressions

Even praise is often the object of an unhealthy greed.

The principal objection to capital is that it's in the hands of the few.

It is the sculptor of his own fortune who fashions a stumbling block into a stepping-stone.

According to Mayor Taylor, the spelling of "Portala" and the pronunciation of "Sutter" are matters of prodigious importance, but apparently the condition of the city's streets is of no consequence. Nothing like having a poet on the job.

Declining the Presidency of Dartmouth College Congressman McCall says there is danger of "some chance barbarism," under the conditions toward which we have been swiftly tending, overturning our temples "and doing more harm in the direction of uncivilizing the country than all our colleges together could possibly repair." Who knows but that this barbarian is now being educated in one of our colleges?

The biggest thing achieved by Mr. Roosevelt during his term of office is the deficit which he bequeathed to his friend Mr. Taft. The people will now please pay the piper.

The truth is that Joe Cannon is held responsible for the rules of the House. But his critics have not the magnaminity to tell the truth. However the old man is apparently able to bear unjust criticism.

Mr. Walter Wellman in a lecture upon journalism before the Missouri State University suggested that what the country needs is a great endowed newspaper. This idea was given birth in Town Talk more than a year ago.

"I believe," said Mr. Root, speaking in the presence of the Legislature at Albany," that the essential quality of free government is to be found in the observance by all public officers of the limitatious set by law upon their powers." Isn't it too bad that Mr. Root never succeeded in making a convert of his dear friend, the gentleman at liberty from Oyster Bay?

One of the Jurors in the Calhoun Case Writes a Harrowing Letter to Democritus Complaining of the Injustice That Has Been Inflicted Upon Him and Picturing in Dark Colors the Disgrace That Has Befallen Him.

Cell 1036, ST. FRANCIS HOTEL.
March 17, 1909.

Dear Mr. Democritus:—

Pardon me for breaking in on your philosophical meditations, but this is a desperate emergency and I must speak to someone. Like sorrow-maddened Lear there is no rescue for me; I am a hopeless prisoner and "even the natural fool of fortune"—prison doors ever yawn before and the turnkey stalks behind.

Perhaps you have guessed already, that I am one of the jurors in the Calhoun case. That is true; I am one of those unfortunate victims of Judge Lawlor's "discretion." Out of the law books he read my doom. The alternative was therein written—freedom or a jail "in the discretion of the court"; and it was the "discretion" of the court that I should go to jail. I was even denied the solace of a definite hope, for my sentence was indeterminate; no man knows how long this trial will last; but as long as it lasts I must endure this constraint; I must wear these shackles of the law, these chains of judicial bondage forged in the slow fires of unjust suspicion.

What is my crime? Why am I thus cabin'd, cribb'd, confined, bound in to saucy doubts and fears of a worshipful justice vested with a little brief authority, most ignorant of what he's most assured, his glassy essence, like an angry ape, playing such fantastic tricks before high heaven as make the angels weep. I am told by my fellow prisoners that I must be patient; that there is no fettering of authority, even that winking authority whose understanding of the law and knowledge of the meaning of dangerous majesty is assumed and presumed rather than establish by confirmations strong as proofs of Holy Writ. Patience! How can I be patient when I reflect upon the rank injustice of my incarceration—when I realize that two of my inalienable rights guaranteed to me by the founders of this nation have been taken from me without warrant of other legal procedure than that prescribed to the "discretion" of a little man in a high office? I am deprived of my liberty and I am debarred from the pursuit of happiness—only my life is spared, but of what worth is life itself without liberty to enjoy it as circumstance permits?

My crime, dear Democritus, is my ignorance and my honesty. I told them in the court that I knew little of this quarrel between Rudolph Spreckels and the enemies he has raised up against himself. I told them that as between Rudolph Spreckels and Patrick Calhoun I could judge fairly, impartially, without bias and in accordance with the evidence that might be brought before me. I told them that I had no opinion upon the issues between the contending factions, and that I could render a just verdict upon the testimony and the law as it should be handed down to me from that etherial height on which Judge Lawlor sits grand, gloomy and most peculiar; wrapped in the solitude of his own originality. I told them these things and I was chosen to do my duty as a citizen of the commonwealth; but attached to the performance of this duty was a penalty—the penalty of imprisonment for such time as the trial of this case may continue.

The law as it was read to me by the learned jurist on the bench prescribed that this penalty should be within the "discretion" of the court. I hold that the word is wrongly written in the book of the law; it should be "suspicion." I am suspected by Judge Lawlor. He thinks that if I am permitted to go at large under parole of the court I will be "approached" by the friends of Patrick Calhoun and that I will yield to the temptations which they will offer. He thinks that they will bribe me to frame my verdict favorable to the defendant in this case. He doubts my honor, my integrity as a citizen, my oath as a juror, my word as a man which has always been as good as any bond that might be required of me, signed, sealed and delivered under solemn admonition that if I forswear myself I must suffer the consequences of my perjury.

This, oh Democritus, is why I am an inmate of cell 1036 of the Hotel St. Francis; this is why I am taken away from my family, from my wife and prattling children, from my business on which I depend for support and for the support of my family. This is my crime and this the penalty. I am a suspect foul with the possibilities of unspeakable venality. I am a helpless, hopeless, unhappy victim of "the discretion of the court"—a thing suspected and a citizen discredited.

If my incarceration is a precautionary measure against William J. Burns, I hasten to assure the court that if that master of the sleuths were to "approach" me I would say to him as one said to an ancestor of William J. Burns, "Get thee behind!" Though he offered me the salary of a Heney or the income of a Spreckels I would still say to William J. Burns "Get thee gone; depart thou from my sight, thou evil one!"

What is it to me that I fare on the best in the market; that I am pampered to the capacity of an unaccustomed palate with the product of a cuisine where presides in absolute authority a chef whose salary exceeds the salary of Judge Lawlor as the salary of Francis J. Heney exceeds that of a cub reporter on the San Francisco Bulletin; that I am permitted to burn rum on my omelette by edict of another "discretionary" utterance of Judge Lawlor; that I smoke the same expensive brand of cigars that my turnkeys smoke—at the cost of my fellow taxpayers; that I sleep in a couch daily swept of crumpled rose leaves; that I may play checkers with my cell mate until jocund day stands tip toe on the mountain top, or count the score at pinochle with the prisoner in the adjoining cell until the electric light pales in the prison corridors and the prison electrician comes to douse the glim. All this is no compensation for the disgrace I feel as I walk through the streets of the city from my prison to the court room, doing the lockstep with my companions in misery while the gaping citizens stare at us from the sidewalk, some of them grinning at us in our utter discomfiture. Neither is it compensation for the deprivation of my home life and my business duties. And above all is it no compensation for the loss—the irreparable loss—I have sustained in the stigma that Judge Lawlor has cast upon my reputation. Who steals my purse, or my pearls, steals trash; 'tis something, nothing; 'twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands; but he that filches from me my good name robs me of that which not enriches him, and makes me poor indeed. Truly is good name in man and woman, the immediate jewel of their souls.

I write to you, dear Democritus, not because I think you can help me, but because I must pour out the griev-

The Last Lesson

(From the French of Maurice Level)

Like an automaton the old woman, sitting near the hearth, drew the flax from her distaff, nodding at regular intervals. The clock ticked softly, the dog slumbered by the fire, and the big cat with her paws tucked in, gazed at the flames through her half-closed eyes.

Early in life this old woman was left a widow with a little daughter. As they were poor when the child grew up she was obliged to seek work in the city. Lonely and friendless, with no one to protect her she took a false step, died in childbirth and left to the care of her mother an innocent babe.

All the old grandmother's affection was now concentrated on the little orphan. That the lad might grow up happy, that he might never know want, she had gone back to work herself almost cheerfully.

She wanted him to be strong, and steady, and a good scholar. So long as he attended school she knew no greater delight than to see him in the evening sitting at the table in the lamplight, learning his lessons and writing his exercises.

Think of it! She could not read, she with her sixty years, and her little boy was at the head of his class!

When he grew old enough to earn a little, she stopped going out to work. And now and then a neighbor passing by and seeing her seated by the window would look in and say:

"Why, grandmother, what luck you have! Why, you are no sooner out of bed than your day's work is done!"

And with smiling face she would reply: "I'm resting now!"

It was not the bliss of having nothing to do that put this joy into her eyes. It was that, after the many long years of sorrow and privation, she had now at last the happiness of being able to say to herself—even she!—"I have now, in my turn, someone to watch over me and protect me in my old age."

Years passed and the time came when her grandson had to leave home for his military service.

Then the old woman grew sad again. She seemed quite broken, shrunken into a semblance of her former self. When she was quite alone she forgot her spinning-wheel and the fine blond flax that frothed out like a cloud on the distaff, and sat with her hands in her lap, weeping silently, ceaselessly.

"Come, come, mamma," said the school-master, taking her one day by surprise before she had time to dry her eyes, "you must not pine away with grief like this! They will send him back to you, que diable! As the support of a family he serves for only a year—ten months, in fact—and that is soon over."

She shook her head. "At my age nothing is soon over any more. I am nearly seventy."

"Eh, what a fine age!"

"Besides, it is not only that. If I knew how to read and write I could get news of him, and be able to send him news from here."

"Oh, but he'll write to you! I'll read you his letters, and you shall dictate yours to me."

She stopped crying. "I thank you kindly. You are very kind. In that way the time won't seem so long."

When the youth had joined his regiment he wrote twice a week. The schoolmaster came, as he had promised, and read her boy's letters to his grannie, and wrote hers to him.

At first this made her almost happy; but in a little while it failed to satisfy her. She felt she wanted to be able to take out these letters and read and reread them at her ease. She dared not ask the schoolmaster to keep coming for this purpose, for she was afraid of troubling him. And she wanted to write letters to her boy about something else than the commonplace home news she dictated, or rather to write to him differently—less with her memory, and more with her heart; she wanted to be able to say dear caressing phrases, that come warm from the heart, like a mother's kiss; the kind of things that you hear said softly in the evening, when your head is on the pillow, before you go to sleep; things to make you dream that grannie is there, close by, just as when you were a very little boy and she came to the side of your little bed, after you'd said your prayers and before she blew out the candle.

Then, all of a sudden, an idea came into her head, and possessed her entirely; why not learn to read and write!

"Suppose I were to ask the school-master? Oh, no, sure, he would laugh at me, at my age! Well, I will learn all by myself."

She walked into the town, and blushed a little as she asked for an A B C book and a slate. To hide her embarrassment she added hastily the small fib: "It is for quite a little child."

When she got home she shut the door and windows, and spread out the pages of the A B C before her. Like the babies she marveled at the colored pictures which adorned the fat letters.

Applying herself studiously to work, bending her head and gripping her tongue between her teeth, with awkward gestures, she learned to trace straight strokes.

If she heard anyone stop outside the door, quick, as if ashamed, she hid the book and pencil, and resumed her place in the chimney-corner as if nothing had happened. But as soon as she was alone again she returned to her work.

Her spindle no longer had any charms for her. In the forsaken flax the Virgin Mary's spiders wove their silvery woof in long threads. Ere long she knew all her letters, and knew, too, how to write them all.

She tried to group the letters, to spell words. Autumn had fled, and then winter, while she was thus at work. By spring-time she could nearly spell!

Patient at the beginning, she was now in a great hurry to be able to read. She said to herself: "If you're such a time about it, he'll be home again before you've learnt!"

With assured indifference she questioned the urchins as they came out of school. One day she found a child who was not more advanced than herself.

"Well, little man, will you soon be able to read?"

"Oh, yes, ma'am, the master says I shall be able to read quite well by prize-day!"

This was in April. She thought to herself: "I must be able to read before he does. My boy will be back in September!"

One morning, as she bent over her task as usual, she was so absorbed in it that she did not hear the school-master come in.

He stood behind her, and contemplated her silently. Presently she turned, uttered a little cry, and made as though to hide her books. But he said:

"Don't hide it, mamma! It is good, very good indeed. You ought to have told me about it. You are a good grannie! Won't you finish learning with me?"

From that day she made much more rapid progress. In a little time she could spell three or four letters at once. As soon as school was over the school-master came to make grannie work.

"You are my best pupil," he said. "It won't be long before you'll not need me any more."

One morning the postman gave her a letter. She spelt

KING EDWARD IN BERLIN

This snapshot of his Royal Highness was taken as he was leaving the British Embassy in the German capital, just one week prior to the flashing of the false news of his death over the world. King Edward had a jolly time in Berlin, where he was the guest of his nephew, the German Emperor. Several dinners and a Court ball were given in his honor; also a performance of Sardanapalus at the Royal Opera House.

An Episode of Chinatown

By Ben. C. Truman

Every city upon the Pacific Coast containing six or seven thousand people and upward has its Chinatown, and every Chinatown has its romance;—for there are Armand Duvals and Claude Melnottes and there are Camilles and Paulines in all these Mongolian communities. Many a highbinder lurks around the dark places seeking the life of some rival merchant or Adonis and many a disconsolate lover has taken a short cut to hades by the strychnine route.

I once knew a Chinaboy who had set his affections on a girl—the property of an avaricious old pagan—who was prepossessing and "velly nice," according to Hop Lee, the Chinaboy aforesaid. Hop had saved enough money to go into the business of raising garden truck on the outskirts of Los Angeles, and in an unfortunate hour his tender affections had been led captive by this new importation from the Flowery Kingdom, and he reciprocated her tenderness with all the ardor of vigorous and impassioned manhood.

But it was necessary to their unalloyed happiness that Hop should redeem his fair one from the clutches of the ogre who claimed her as his property.

So the chivalrous hero of this romance toiled and saved and put the biggest strawberries on the tops of his boxes, until, by incessant industry and great economy, he had accumulated $300 toward her ransom. But the owner wanted just twice that insignificant sum. She was a fancy piece of property and the owner declared that she must bring a fancy price. To get $600 together, the lover reasoned, would take at least another year, if not more. Then, again, she might be sent away. Or, good Heavens! she might meet some other Romeo who had a sufficiency of shekels and who might marry her at the drop of the handkerchief. At any rate the procuring of the other $300 by work was out of the question, and the hinges of the lower regions were effulgence itself compared to the cimmerian vapor which engulfed their entangled hearts.

Just one ray of sunshine, however, came from the dark clouds that seemingly gave the lovers no hope. In the labyrinth of Chinatown there lived a terrible beast, whose conquest would result in wealth and glory to the successful antagonist. Animated, no doubt, by the maxims that "None but the brave deserve the fair," and "Fortune favors the brave," our audacious lover sallied out in the direction of the lair of the beast with fifteen twenties in his pockets. Melican owner of the tiger awfully polite to heathen Chinese upon all such occasions and quickly shoved him a stack of dollar chips and took his first twenty in out of the wet.

The rest is briefly told. John lost all but his honor, and he would have lost that could he have hypothecated it for another score of ivories. He then acquainted his Dulcinea with his unsuccessful attack upon the beast aforesaid, and quickly afterward hung himself in a cellar, and the poor girl submerged her woe in a cup of cold poison that laid her out as stiff in death as if she had been accidently hit by an electric car.

The Spectator

Baldwin's Passion for Litigation

Even with attorneys engaged to break the Baldwin will the probability is that no contest will take place; not at least between the widow and daughters. Illegitimate children may come to the front to plunge the estate into litigation, but the heirs to whom the bulk of the estate was bequeathed are not disposed to engage in a contest with the widow who has substantial rights which are not to be lightly considered. The will so far as the widow is concerned is regarded by men who were well acquainted with the deceased as a sardonic jest characteristic of the old libertine. For, say they, he must have known that the widow would not accept a small legacy, and it must have been his desire to figure in post-mortem litigation. Baldwin had a very keen appetite for litigation. He hated to pay a bill without a fight in court. He resisted claims that he knew to be just, and when asked once why he did so he replied that he couldn't be sure that he owed money until the court rendered judgment. Once upon a time he borrowed money from his lawyer to pay a judgment, and then the lawyer had to sue him to recover the borrowed money.

Proud of His Record

One of Baldwin's old cronies has suggested that perhaps the millionaire turfman was desirous of perpetuating his memory after the manner of Sharon, Fair, Blythe, Jessup and the other pioneers whose escapades are described in spicy court records that have something of the flavor of the songs of Catullus and Ovid's Art of Love. Baldwin left behind a record for amorous dalliance that makes all others of California origin seem pale and jejune. With him love was a fugitive caprice lightly assumed and readily discarded. Free from sentimentality he was notorious for his Babylonian lubricity down to the last days of his life. A contest over his estate is bound to be productive of disclosures far from edifying and racy enough to gratify the most ardent lovers of the very rankest erotic literature.

Our New Naval Chief

Apparently naval heroes are becoming scarce in the service. Nowadays when an officer is promoted hardly anybody knows of anything that he ever did to win renown. Not many of the officers that made history for the navy are now treading the decks of our vessels. The other day Rear Admiral Seaton Schroeder raised the blue pennant on the Connecticut as commander-in-chief of the Atlantic battleship fleet, and there were irreverent persons who asked: "Who in——is Schroeder? What battle did he win? Where was he shot? The fact is that Schroeder never did anything thrilling or picturesque in his life. The fact also is that the present commander-in-chief of the great Atlantic fleet was once Governor of Guam. It might be said that he graduated from Guam to the big job he now holds. Verily promotion in the navy is fast if not furious these days. The only real war Schroeder was ever in was the Spanish farce-comedy, and then instead of doing serious, effective work he commanded the Vesuvius, which was the biggest joke in the whole burlespue. It will be remembered that the Vesuvius was a comical experiment which provoked the ribald laughter of nations at our expense. That vessel was to be employed as a dynamite thrower, and Schroeder was the builder thereof. The Vesuvius was expected to be a great terror to the foe, but when she was sent down to Santiago to blow Cuba out of the sea the thought occurred to somebody that possibly she might prove fatal to herself. However, the throwing of a few shells was hazarded and then the Vesuvius returned home to be converted into a torpedo practice ship.

He Fought Against Korea.

Rear-Admiral Schroeder has had the rare distinction of figuring in two mimic wars. In 1870 when he was on the Pacific station, under Rear-Admiral Rodgers, the United States had trouble with Korea, which grew out of the murder of the passengers and crew of the American trading ship General Sherman, in 1866. Rodgers, on the Colorado, led the Asiatic Squadron up Salt River in Korea on June 1st. Schroeder was then an ensign on the Benicia. Fire was opened on the United States flotilla from the mainland and island simultaneously. The guns of the Palos and Monocacy of the United States squadron soon got busy, and their eight-inch sheels tore big holes in the wall of the battery. In ten minutes the two forts were silenced, only one American being wounded. The launch of the Benicia, which was commanded by Ensign Schroeder, when going up the river, ran the gantlet of the two Korean forts, being hit in many places, though not seriously damaged. Afterwards officers and men from the fleet captured and destroyed the fort. It was said at the time that the Koreans fought well. Their weapons were wretched old firelocks, and their cutlasses were made of soft iron, which bent like old hoops. They were dressed in armor of nine thicknesses, cotton-padded, so that only rifle balls could penetrate it, and were quite surprised at the failure of their forts to annihilate the American vessels at the first fire.

He Captured the Obelisk

Distinction again came to Schroeder in 1880 when he was a lieutenant under Lientenant-Commander Gorringe on the expedition to Egypt for the purpose of capturing the obelisk known as Cleopatra's needle and transporting the treasure to New York. After completing that task he was assigned to the Fish Commission steamer Albatross. President Roosevelt made him a rear-admiral last May and he was appointed to the command of the second division of the fleet which circumnavigated the globe to make a Roosevelt holiday. Though it has not been Rear-Admiral Schroeder's good fortune to figure early and often as a hero he is as a matter of fact about the finest type of manly officer the country produces. He is wholly without braggadocio and desire for self-advertisement, and is emphatically a duty officer. If he is not prominent as an expert in any one branch of his profession, he is excellently well-rounded professionally by training and experience, and emphatically a polished man of the world, having traveled so much. Seaton Schroeder is richest in his having the respect and high regard of his fellow-officers, which is after all the highest reward that can come to a soldier or sailor.

A Poet on a Poet

Edwin Markham has discovered George Sterling and after careful analysis of his find is graciously pleased to pronounce him "a poet, a true poet." That settles it. We have long suspected that George Sterling was "a poet, a true poet," and now the suspicion is confirmed by an authority on poets, true poets, that cannot be disputed. Edwin Markham has set the seal of his approval on George Sterling and that singer may now go ringing down the grooves of change with Tennyson, Browning, Swinburne, Wordsworth, Keats, Shelley and the rest of them. Edwin Markham, himself a poet, although not yet hall marked "a true poet," has inscribed the name of George Sterling high on the scroll of great poets, and there it will stay until all save those there written are forgotten of men and forever buried in Time's wallet wherein he puts alms for oblivion.

A Poem That is Not a Poem

There is a fly, however, in the ointment with which Edwin Markham anoints this new-found poet. "The Wine of Wizardry" which is the theme of Critic Markham's panegyric is unquestionably a great poem but, asks the man that wrote "The Man With the Hoe," is it "our greatest poem?" Having got thus far in his critical examination of "The Wine of Wizardry," Poet Markham takes the back track and declares it can scarcely be called a poem; that it does not seem to have "organic unity;" that it is full of "words, images and fine lines, but they are not fused into a living whole." In other words, that it is not a poem in the sense that "The Man With the Hoe" is a poem. In every literary creation, Critic Markham insists, there must be a central figure—for example, in "The Man With the Hoe" there is the man with the hoe, a "central figure" around whom is "something that corresponds to a woven plot followed by a consistent crisis." What this "consistent crisis" is in "The Man With the Hoe" Critic Markham does not tell us, but he is free to say that it does not exist in "The Wine of Wizardry." Critic Markham suspects Poet Sterling of "intending to give us only a series of weird pictures," and he is compelled to admit that if his suspicion is correct Poet Sterling has "made a remarkable success." I am glad to hear the laureate of the Hoe say this. I was afraid that if "The Wine of Wizardry" was not "our greatest poem," nor even "scarcely to be called a poem" at all, it was hopeless—a thing of fuss and fustian. But Critic Markham does not wholly condemn Poet Sterling's star "poem"—if I may be permitted to apply the conventional designation of things that lilt along to a prescribed measure and rime at the ends of the lines. "The Wine of Wizardry" is not, of course, in the Hoe class of "our greatest poems," but " as a series of gorgeous dissolving views it is unequaled by anything else in our literature; it stands alone, a marvel of color and verbal beauty. I wonder why the poet that gave us "The Man With the Hoe" didn't compare "The Wine of Wizardry" to a "moving picture" instead of applying that old parallel of the "dissolving view?" Perhaps he was in a hurry and eager to get to work on a real poem of his

The Los Angeles Patriot

Mr. Edwin T. Earl, the civic patriot of Los Angeles, who extorted the resignation of Mayor Harper by threatening to expose that weak and erring wretch to public obloquy is typical of the up-to-date reformer. Mr. Earl is the man that organized the fruit shipping trust, which, by exacting rebates grew rich at the expense of the fruit raisers of Southern California. Mr. Earl sold out for a very large sum of money which now enables him to be virtuous and with the aid of which he scaled an eminence from which he can look down with scorn on evil-doers. From Mr. Earl's case we learn that rebating is a practice which may be indulged for the welfare of the commonwealth, since it may enable a man to acquire spiritual as well as material capital wherewith to wage war against unrighteousness. But despite Mr. Earl's beneficent activities the fruit growers of Los Angeles are of the opinion that they should be grateful only for his withdrawal from the shipping business. That the information which he acquired as a shipper enabled him to imprecate intelligently the iniquity in which he had been engaged has afforded the fruit growers no particular satisfaction.

A Man of His Word

A Los Angeles correspondent informs me that there are two stories in circulation with reference to the resignation of Harper. One is that the Mayor was gumshoed into the tenderloin and photographed while behaving in a manner unbecoming the Executive of a moral community. The other is that documentary evidence was found of a contract under which certain tenderloin establishments were "protected." There are many people who do not believe that Harper is corrupt and I am informed that nothing short of substantial evidence of corruption could have defeated him at the polls. As Earl has said that the evidence in his possession did not concern the public, the inference is warranted that it deals with Harper's personal conduct, and if such is the case it is by no means certain that it would not react against the man by whom it was gathered. However, we shall probably learn the nature of the evidence, for a grand jury investigation has been ordered and Earl has said that while he promised Harper that he would not use the evidence in his newspaper he did not promise that he would not use it in legal proceedings. Which shows that Reformer Earl is a pretty cute promiser, a man who is nothing if not a man of his mathematically accurate word. Poor Harper! Perhaps he deserves all that he is getting, but even though such should prove to be the case his tragic plight will be none the less piteous. "I entered politics," he said to an interviewer, "with money and without an enemy. Now I am broke and without a friend." Nevertheless throw him to the earls.

An Easy Question Answered

Apparently the subsidized weeklies have again wounded the tender sensibilities of the Boughten Bulletin. Through its chartered columns it emitted a characteristic roar the other day in token of its indignation at the publication of the facts with reference to the enormous sums of money that have been paid to the Hon. Francis J. Heney ostensibly for the purpose of prosecuting land sharks. By way of diversion from the issue the Bulletin asked at the top of its voice whether Heney is not worthy of his hire. This of course is not the question, but to be amiable and agreeable I will make answer that as Mr. Heney failed to land any of the sharks in the penitentiary I am inclined to the opinion that the fee was exorbitant. To be frank I will add that I suspect the Bulletin of having asked this easy question for the purpose of having me call attention to what Mr. Heney did not do. Between ourselves the Bulletin doesn't like Mr. Heney. The editor of the Bulletin is so envious of Heney that he has taken even the dogs in the street into his confidence. But the Bulletin is paid to boost Heney and there is nothing the Bulletin will not do for money. Occasionally, however, there is something sinister in its boost, as for example this very panegyric which presents the interrogatory calling for the obvious and making it appear that Mr. Heney is answering his detractors, thus rendering illogical the position which hitherto he has consistently maintained with reference to the fee paid by the Contra Costa Water Company. Since it now appears that Mr. Heney has deigned to reply with reference to the federal fee there is apparently no reason why he should not explain the other and more mysterious one. This, however, he need not do out of deference to my curiosity, as I have none. I don't care how many fees Mr. Heney receives, how he earns them, or how extravagant the compensation exacted for his services. So far as I as concerned there was no occasion for the Boughten Bulletin's sinister roar. The imputation justified by the news of the federal fee was not that Heney had been overpaid but that the Bulletin had been guilty of misrepresentation as usual in depicting him as a poor man who was rapidly pauperizing himself on the altar of patriotism.

It's Too Good

According to the dispatches, Mlle. Liane de Pougy has written a play. This is not surprising, as de Pougy is extremely clever. But it may be considered remarkable that her play is so moral that no Parisian theatrical manager will take the risk of producing it. Mlle. de Pougy has been pronounced by so competent an expert as Colonel Kowasky's friend, Leopold, King of the Belgians, as the most beautiful woman in the world. She has gained more or less distinction by twice attempting suicide. Once she said she was tired of her life, which, on review, may not seem to have allowed her many moments of ennui. Her second attempt to rid the world of a lovely woman was provoked, she explained after it failed, by the misfortune that she truly loved a man who did not return her devotion. Of course, love, however momentary, is a catastrophe in the life of such persons as Liane de Pougy. Not long ago Mlle. Otero, the Spanish singer, and de Pougy had a fight. The Spanish woman called the French woman a cat. Some weeks later both women appeared on the same stage. On the first night their rival songs and dances and glances were outshone only by their display of diamonds and other jewels. The next night Otero glistened like a jeweller's window on the Rue de la Paix. Liane appeared a few minutes later. Not a gem gleamed on her neck, on her corsage, on her hands. She was as sombre as a funeral mute. When her act was finished, when applause was sounding, her maid advanced to her on the stage. The maid took from her own shoulders a long cloak to throw over de Pougy. Men in the audience were almost blinded. The maid was dazzling. She wore every piece of jewelry that ever had been given her mistress.

Disqualifying Judges

A bill is before the Legislature which provides for the disqualification of a judge upon affidavit of a defendant setting forth that he believes the judge is prejudiced and that he cannot have a fair trial before him. I see no harm in this measure. All judges are more or less human and subject to human passions and human prejudices. These judges are as prone to their likes and dislikes as other men, and their opinions are as firm set as those of other intelligent, thinking citizens. No special divinity hedges a judge or lifts him above the mass of mankind to vest him with omniscience. Therefore, if a defendant can show that a judge is unfit to try his case because he is prejudiced he should be allowed to do so with greater facility than is vouchsafed by the law in its present imperfect condition. The mere belief of the defendant that he will not receive fair treatment from the judge should be sufficient to remove his case from that jurisdiction. I can conceive of no valid objection to the measure especially as the defendant has no voice in the selection of the substitute trial judge. I hope the bill will become a law.

Sauce for the Gander

If I were a legislator, however, I should suggest an amendment to the proposed law. I would make it provide that judges accused of bias shall be subjected to the bullyragging processes now inflicted on jurors by lawyers seeking to ascertain "the state of mind" of the juryman. I see no difference between the judge of a court and the juror who is to render the verdict in the case. If it is found that the juror is prejudiced, biased, or possessed of an opinion so strong that evidence will not remove it, he is challenged for cause. Why should not a judge be treated in the same manner on affidavit of a litigant that he believes the court is in a "state of mind" inimical to his interests? Why should not the judge be called down from the bench to the witnesses chair and compelled to answer questions touching his qualifications to act as a judge in the case? Why should he not be asked whether he approves or disapproves of immunity; whether he has read the newspapers and from that reading formed an opinion on the case; whether he would believe the boodling supervisors under oath notwithstanding their "confessions"; and whether he thinks these supervisors should have been punished for their crimes? These are the questions that are asked of jurors—why should they not be asked of the judge who is to try the case? I hope that the bill will be amended as I have suggested; not because such amendment would make it a better bill, but because I would like to sit gloating over the judge subjected to such an examination—because I would like to see him on the same grill where so many unfortunate jurors have been roasted in the fire of interrogatory by fiendish lawyers bent upon torturing the secrets of their victims from the inmost depths of their souls.

Stanton's Dark Mystery

Isn't it about time that Speaker Stanton gave up that dread secret which he said oppressed his soul so grievously while the legislature was debating the advisability of making laws to curb the pernicious activity of the Japanese "in our midst" and to "stem the tide of invasion" from the land of little brown men? I remember that it was a secret of the State variety and that Speaker Stanton promised to tell us all about it as soon as the peril which it involved had passed. The peril has passed and we now ask Speaker Stanton to cough up. What was it that affrighted him in that hour of deadly menace? It must have been something awful or he wouldn't have kicked up such a rumpus about it. He didn't say at the time that he held the dread secret in the escrow of diplomatic confidence, but, on the contrary, he declared that within a few days he would tell what would happen to us unless we obeyed the commands of Roosevelt and performed the five-bump kowtow in the presence of his imperial majesty of Japan. He hasn't told us yet; and he seems to have forgotten his promise. This is to remind him that we are still listening for an explanation of this international mystery. Most of us hope that the secret will be divulged before the end of this memorable session of the legislature. We want to know precisely how much we are indebted to Speaker Stanton, so that we can erect a few monuments to him while he is still alive and pass some resolutions to be engrossed and framed and hung on the wall of the Stanton dining-room beside the "God bless our home" motto. We want to know just what Roosevelt intended to do with us if we defied his ukase, or what the Mikado would have done to us if, at the earnest behest of Speaker Stanton we had not bumped our heads in the dust five times and humbly begged his majesty's pardon for presuming to insult his coolie schoolboy subjects.

Was It a Bluff?

Now that Roosevelt is no more, Speaker Stanton can make a clean breast of it without fear of dire consequences to himself. Roosevelt is now a negligible quantity and if Speaker Stanton has designs on the port collectorship of San Pedro or San Diego he will have do the crook-back act in the presence of President Taft—Roosevelt has forgotten the existence of Stanton, and if he vaguely remembers the man that so resolutely and servilely performed his bidding he will not take the trouble to order his successor to "take care of his Californian deputy stick-wielder. Speaker Stanton may now unbosom himself of that horrible State secret without hesitation; and he ought to do so. It is an awful thing to pack around in the dark; and suppose Speaker Stanton should die before he wakes, carrying that tremendous weight upon his conscience—imagine the conversation that will ensue when he knocks at the pearly gates and asks St. Peter to let him in notwithstanding that he is a politician and that he has served a term in the legislature. For myself, I don't believe Speaker Stanton has any State secret locked in his breast; and I don't believe that he ever had any. I am of the opinion that it was a bold, bad bluff on his part, put up for the purpose of enhancing his own importance and imposing on the people. I don't believe that Senator Stanton is big enough in the estimation of the State Department to be entrusted with a secret that involved two nations in such a tangle as was intimated when this member of the California assembly came down from his desk and made that highfalutin speech on the floor of the House. Anyway, I am sure that if it was really a secret of State that lay concealed in the Stanton inside it wasn't much of a secret after all except as it might be viewed through the Stanton vanity. And by the way, while I am on this subject, let me inquire, who is this Stanton? I hear that he is something in Los Angeles or thereabouts; but in truth this is the first time I have heard of him; so it is safe to assume that he isn't such a vast quantity even in the politics of Southern California.

"More Power" Leighton

Whenever "Jack" Leighton comes within hailing distance of his intimates, some one is sure to salute him with the Irish greeting, "More power to you, Leighton." Some curious by-stander recently inquired the origin of the singular salutation, and a satisfactory explanation was forthcoming. Leighton, it seems, besides being a shining light of the Bohemian Club, is a prominent official of the Union Street car line. "Haven't you ever noticed the rate at which the Union street cars travel? They go a few blocks, then stop, then crawl another block, and stop again," was the answer to the question propounded. "So whenever Jack Leighton comes into view, we always call out to him, 'More power to you, Leighton,' and the name has stuck."

A Missionary Hero

Dr. Wilfrid L. Grenfell, who is making his first visit to the Pacific Coast, is one of the remarkable men of the times, a veritable hero of peace, who, like most men of deeds, is chary of words. He is the volunteer medical missionary to the fisher folk of Labrador and Newfoundland, those isolated people whose heroisms and hardships have been the theme of Norman Duncan's best work. Poverty is, of course, a relative matter, and even hardship is comparative, but no one who has read even one of the short stories included in "The Way of the Sea" can ever again think lightly of the inhabitants of that bleak coast and their needs, especially in the way of medical and surgical assistance. Dr. Grenfell was led to give his attention to this branch of practice directly through the influence of Sir Frederick Treves, who is his hero. After completing his course in the London schools and hospitals, he connected himself for a time with the Royal National Mission of Deep Sea Fishermen, established chiefly through the influence of Sir Frederick, then Dr. Treves, and it was while with the North Sea fleet that a conversation with his superior led Dr. Grenfell to attach himself to the isolated Labradoreans in 1892. The immediate object of Dr. Grenfell's mission is to gather funds for the establishment of a Sailors' Home at St. John's, Newfoundland, the annual resort of eighty thousand deep-sea fishermen for whose care and entertainment no provision whatever is made. The missionary is especially desirous of building tanks in which these hardy fishermen may learn the indispensable art of swimming, for, strange as it may appear, but few of them are able to sustain themselves in the water, and every year there are innumerable deaths from drowning. The waters of the North Atlantic are so cold that even these hardy amphibians are unable to bear the exposure long enough to learn to swim in the open sea. But a few months ago the captain of the "Lorna Doone," one of Dr. Grenfell's own schooners, was drowned. The doctor himself, on last Easter Sunday, was saved from drowning by his ability as a swimmer when he was carried out to sea on an ice pan with his sled and dog team. An account of the ordinary everyday expeditions undertaken by Dr. Grenfell and his assistants in the interests of humanity reads like the adventure of an Arctic exploration expedition. Floating ice, extreme cold, accident and obstacles overcome by indomitable courage and perseverence are everyday occurrences. The medical mission is supported by voluntary contributions, and there are several Grenfell Associations in existence in various parts of the country, established since Norman Duncan made known the needs of the community and the work of the medical mission through his "Dr. Grenfell's Mission," and his stories of the coast, some of which were doubted until, challenged, he produced documentary evidence in proof.

Sleuths Soldiering on the Job

Since the Examiner ceased to immortalize William J. Burns in its Mutt department that eminent detective does not seem to be earning his salt. As far as I can observe all the city is getting for its $70,000 of "secret service" money is the ha-ha. His bunch of inexperienced sleuths are not making as many "mistakes" as they did in the first enthusiasm of their congenial employment—none of them has approached a juror in the Calhoun case for a month and whatever inquiries they are making concerning the "state of mind" and family or political connections of the talesmen are confined to guarded questions at the corner grocery, casual interrogatories in the butcher shop and an occasional gumshoe promenade in the wake of the proposed juror as he wends his way to the club, the union, the pinochle party, the theater or the drug store. But this pedestrian exercise is not often indulged by these "shadows." It is much easier to report to the head sleuth that there was "nothing doing," and more time is gained for the evening pleasures of the sub-sleuth. Some of them were pretty busy, however, a few days ago working up a case of contempt against the Citizens' Alliance and the Evening Globe in the matter of those editorial anti-graft prosecution pages of the Globe sent to members of the Citizens' Alliance who happened to be summoned on the Calhoun jury. For a time it looked as if the eggs in this mare's nest were fat with the meat of crime, but when it was called to the attention of Burns that the Alliance had as much right to send newspapers to its members as the Bulletin had to send its libellous and mendacious diatribes to its subscribers, the stupidity of the entire proceeding began slowly to dawn on the dull perception of the great detective. It is not likely that the secret service department of the District Attorney's office will even attempt to earn its salt until the appropriation approaches the renewal stage. Then, of course, there will be lively scurrying to and fro and loud hullaballoo in the columns of

A Lure for the Beautiful

In order that the interest in the Portola festival shall be not merely local but coincident with the boundaries of the State those in charge of the affair have decided to offer a prize of the value of one hundred dollars for the photograph of the most beautiful young lady in California. The photo which is selected by the committee will be given to an artist to serve for a model of a poster strictly characteristic of California, and which will be distributed virtually all over the world. Patriotism, if not the prize, should influence every beautiful daughter, whether native or adopted, to come forward. The Portola Festival, which is to be held in San Francisco, between the nineteenth and the twenty-third of October of this year, will commemorate the one hundred and fortieth anniversary of the discovery of San Francisco bay, and will occur during the pleasantest season of the year. People in the East already regard California as a beautiful winter resort, and the publicity will bring the State and the city before the world in a more comprehensive and conspicuous manner than ever before. To be chosen as the representative of California beauty on an occasion such as this is no small honor to be lightly esteemed. The competition will close on Friday, April 2nd. Mark the name and address plainly on the back of the photos, and address to the Executive Committee, Portola Festival, rooms 936-938 Phelan Building, San Francisco. It is understood that the committee reserves the right to publish the photographs in newspapers as it may deem proper. For the purpose of bringing together representatives of every interest in connection with the Portola Fiesta, to be held in this city next October a banquet, at which Mayor Taylor will preside, is to be held at the St. Francis Hotel on the evening of Thursday, March 25th. The presidents of all the commercial, fraternal, civic and labor organizations have been invited to attend, as well as the publishers of the various local periodicals with a view to promoting discussion and eliciting ideas which will help to make a success of the affair. It should prove a representative organization, and with a proper display of the get-together spirit, the enterprise will be greatly furthered by the meeting.

Brilliant Woman a Pauper

Olive Logan, according to the telegraphic reports from England, is now an inmate of a pauper lunatic asylum near London. She was one of the brilliant figures of her day, a writer of some note, the author of at least one successful play, a lecturer who could command audiences, and one of the shining lights of the early woman's suffrage movement. She was married three times, divorced twice, and apparently lived a full life. She has been for many years a pensioner on the bounty of Lady Cook, who was Miss Tennie C. Claffin, one of the advanced women of forty odd years ago, who preached revolutionary doctrines on the subject of marriage and "rights" generally. Olive Logan is but one more example of the impracticability of the reformers, and her fate calls to mind the remark of the mother of the Rosettis, that though she had always been an admirer of genius she did heartily wish that her own brood had displayed less genius and more common sense.

Scientific simplification characterizes the OAKLAND throughout. It has fewer working parts than any other motor car and is a masterly example of what unit construction means to the automobile world.

The Most Liberal Spender Elected

Advocates of the direct primary may find much to interest them in the news from Wisconsin. The expenses of the primary canvass were as follows according to the sworn returns: McGovern, $11,000; Hatton, $30,000; Cook, $42,000 and Stephenson, $108,000. The votes at the primary were in proportion to the money spent, and after balloting for two months the Legislature elected Stephenson, the most liberal spender. In this connection it is worth while observing that in New York under the constitutional system Elihu Root received the unanimous vote of his party at the first session of the Legislature without the disbursement of a postage stamp.

The Complete St. Francis

Ground will be broken immediately for the Annex to the Hotel St. Francis, which will continue the building to the corner of Post and Powell, and give a long frontage on Post street. Complete as the present three-wing structure is, the Annex will provide features heretofore unknown even in the latest and most luxurious New York caravansaries, and these are really in response to the demands made upon the St. Francis as the center of social festivities as well as of the great public fiesta of San Francisco, while the additional room accommodation will relieve the pressure of what is perhaps the most sustained demand ever experienced by a hotel in America. To contribute to the convenience and privacy of guests who attend the many exclusive balls and functions given at the hotel, there will be both a street entrance and a carriage and automobile driveway on Post Street, which will completely isolate them from the rest of the hotel. Ladies will find a series of cloak and reception rooms, and a section of the second floor will be devoted to hat and coat rooms, reception rooms, a spacious lounging and smoking room, and other conveniences for gentlemen attending functions in the ball room. With the new arrangements it will be possible to entertain several parties in one evening, each of which will be isolated from the others and from the public sections of the hotel. A convenience which will be generally appreciated will be the Turkish baths in the basement of the Annex. These baths will be spacious and represent in their equipment the latest scientific ideas, with an architectural rendering which will probably approach the old Roman idea more closely than anything yet attempted in a modern structure, as will be befitting the exclusive patronage to which they will be devoted. The room which will be offered free of charge to the artists of California for the permanent exhibition of the best canvasses and sculpture of the West will be on one of the highest floors and command an outlook over the bay and city which will impress travelers with the position of California as an art center. Incidentally also it will bring the artists into touch with that class of people whose admiration finds expression in the form of cash.

The walls of the studio were decorated with original posters, the work of the art students, and at the close of the entertainment they were presented to the visitors.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Dullness continues in the New York Stock Market. Fluctuations have been very narrow, Erie carrying the banner for weakness. Its influence spread into other securities causing some decline. Copper stocks were somewhat depressed by the declining tendency of the metal market. Notwithstanding the reduction in metal prices the demand has not strengthened much while stocks of copper continue to increase. We hear talk of ten cent copper within the near future. The Steel stocks have been well supported of late. Any harm tariff revision can do to the steel industry has been fully discounted in the recent decline of steel securities. The United States Steel Corporation has within the past two years invested about fifty millions in betterments from their surplus earnings without impairing their common and preferred dividends. This would indicate how strong the corporation's finances are. * * * The Harriman clique have something up their sleeve that will soon change conditions. It will be surprising if the Overland Limited leaving San Francisco does not within one year go through to New York without a change of cars. This will cause the Pennsylvania to carry out the same programme via the Atchison. Great things that will soon be in evidence are being quietly arranged in the railway world. They will prove startling in their magnitude and will result in great good to the public as well as the railways. * * * The local security maket has been active. Considerable investment buying is in evidence. The Pacific Telegraph and Telephone Company having disposed of $15,000,000 of their bonds will pay off its floating obligation and finance improvements for a year or more. This means a great deal to holders of the preferred and common stock. It is more than likely the common stock will be placed upon a 2½ per cent dividend basis which would make it look cheap at 40. The Pacific T. & T. Co. is under the best management possible. The great improvement in its service during the past year speaks for itself.

The main development in the wheat trade has been the government report showing reserves in farmers' hands up to March 1st as being 143,000,000 bushels compared with 148,000,000 bushels at the same time last year. This in itself while not a bearish statement was much larger than the trade had looked for and 20,000,000 bushels more than an estimate given out by a private statistician whose figures are considered reliable by the trade. A good many local traders who have been very bullish were inclined to let go and sentiment changed quickly to the bear side with a drop in the May price to around 112⅜ and July around 102. The leading bull interest however, stood ready to take all the wheat offered at the decline and when the bears tried to cover their short contracts they found very little wheat for sale and the market regained nearly all of its loss and the report has now ceased to be a factor. The extreme high prices for cash wheat at all markets have caused quite an increase in receipts and a let up in the cash demand.

The export demand is also a little slow at the moment although reports from the other side indicate that the foreigner must have our wheat and a resumption in this line is confidently expected by the big bull interest. The trade got its first damage reports on the growing crop this year from Kansas, Missouri and Illinois, telling of damage to wheat by the extreme cold weather during the winter and by thawing and freezing weather in the past ten days; also that wheat which had been sown late last fall did not germinate. It must not be overlooked that according to the government figures issued in December the acreage was two million less than last year and that there is the insect damage to be reckoned with later. On the whole there is nothing in the situation to scare the bull in the July option and as long as the cash price continues so high and the leading bull interest takes care of the May option we think the holders of July will have no trouble marking up prices, with the price at present at such a big discount under the cash article.

Cotton.—After having had about four years experience of anti-future legislation in the South Atlantic States and about two years to study effects of the enactment of the same law in some of the lower Mississippi valley states and in Texas, the conclusion has been reached that it was unwise to saddle the Southern states thus and to bridle the buying power of its people in such a manner as to prohibit them from exercising their judgment whenever they saw a favorable opportunity. According to a Houston, Texas, special, which appeared in the shape of a lengthy open letter in the New Orleans Daily Picayune, former President E. A. Calvin, and a present day leader of the Texas Farmers' Union, says that the cotton farmers have lost $300,000,000 since the anti-future laws became effective. It is said that Mr. Calvin was very largely responsible for the passage of the Texas Mayfield anti-future bill two years ago, and he now asks that the law be repealed as soon as possible. After enacting the anti-future law in Texas, the State suffered from a severe drouth in the summer of 1907 and the result was that the crop of that important section of the belt was reduced to about one-half of a full yield, a little over 2,000,000 bales having been made. Small as the crop was, however, the close of the season saw prices at the lowest levels of the year, 9 1-8 cents against 13 9-16 when the season opened under the auspices of the anti-future law. In an effort to secure a remunerative price for their cotton, warranted on account of the crop famine in the western part of Texas, farmers of that section, finding the market declining day by day refused to sell until another crop was upon them, and in doing so suffered a loss of about $20.00 per bale. This season with the law still in force, Texas was blessed with a large crop, about 4,000,000 bales, and having failed in their policy of holding for higher prices last season they became the freest of sellers from very opening of the year, offering on a declining market from 9 1-8 on September 1st down to about 8 1-2 cents basis middling. In this instance the spinner, as in the previous year, reaped the

Another Darling Epigram

Mrs. [illegible] Darling, who recently cast a bomb into the midst of the Burlingame social set, has not exhausted her ammunition by any means. Since the occasion when her caustic tongue created such havoc amongst the claims of the pretenders, she was lunching quiety with a friend at the St. Francis. Her morning hours had been spent in superintending the arrangements of her Clay street house, and she was plainly and suitably clothed for the occasion. Two women of the Burlingame set, both elegantly and extravagantly attired, passed the table where she sat, and the younger of the twain remarked to her companion in low tones, pitched for the benefit of the occupants of the table: "The idea of dining in public in such a dowdy old dress!" Mrs. Darling, in a contralto profundo, loud enough to be heard by every ear within gunshot, retorted: "My clothes don't have to carry me through society; yours do." The Burlingame contingent reconnoitered the situation and beat a hasty retreat through the nearest doorway. Mrs. Darling has just bought the house at Monterey formerly occupied by her daughter, Mrs. Maude. Major Darling is in the east at present, but he will return to California shortly and the Darlings will then leave for Monterey where they will spend the next six months.

The Newhall-McBean Engagement

Announcement was made this week of the engagement of Miss Margaret Newhall, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Mayo Newhall and Athol McBean, only son of Mr. and Mrs. Peter McBean, and junior partner in the pottery works of Gladding & McBean. Miss Newhall is one of three attractive daughters of the Newhall household, a brunette of rich and brilliant coloring. She has traveled much, and has had all the advantages which can be derived from opportunities of culture. She is a general favorite in society, especially in the Burlingame set, and is one of the few really good horsewomen in the social elect. Since Mrs. Newhall returned from abroad last year with her three attractive daughters, Miss Marion, Miss Elizabeth, and Miss Margaret, the prospective bride, their handsome home on Scott street has been the scene of much festivity. Mrs. Newhall is noted for her hospitality. She was Miss Bessie Slade of Philadelphia. She came to San Francisco about twenty-seven years ago on a visit to her cousin, Mrs. Robert N. Graves, and it was at their home on Van Ness avenue that her wedding, a notable society event, was celebrated. Both Miss Newhall and Mr. McBean have had social experience enough to know their own minds, for both have been engaged before. About two years ago, at one of the largest teas given that season, the announcement of an engagement between Miss Margaret Newhall and Mr. Frank Houteling of Chicago was made, but it came to nothing, for quite suddenly Miss Newhall exercised the prerogative of her sex and changed her mind, saying that it was folly to wed when her heart was not in it. She decided that she did not care for Mr. Houteling enough, or in a manner to justify marriage, and while the families were intimate, and the young people remained always the best of friends, there was no renewal of the agreement, though it is said that Mr. Houteling was more than willing. Mr. McBean's experience was somewhat similar. For about a year he was the accepted suitor of Miss Helen Dean, but her fickle affections were transferred elsewhere. Mr. McBean went east, the engagement was broken, and then, 'tis said, the second suitor took his innings and transferred his attentions to another shrine. The Newhall-McBean wedding will take place in May, and will be a brilliant and fashionable social affair. They will leave immediately after the wedding for a motor tour abroad.

Harriman's Plucky Daughter

Among the distinguished members of the Harriman party on the present Western trip is Robert Walton Goelet, the young New York millionaire, heir to the every day rain or shine galloping over the roads, taking fences and brooks with equal nerve and dash. Miss Harriman is a born horsewoman. She can ride anything. There is nothing she likes better than a spirited horse, unless it be a skittish one. It is related that her pluck nearly brought her to grief in Arizona when she elected to ride a bronco which had no especial reputation for good behavior. The New York girl was no sooner in the saddle than the brute began bucking. With great cleverness and skill Miss Harriman kept her seat, meeting every move of the vicious animal as he plunged and leaped. Mr. Harriman and several other men rushed to the rescue, but they couldn't get near the frenzied bronco. "I can hold on," cried Miss Harriman, smiling, while she clung to saddle and reins like a veteran bronco-buster, but finally the horse slipped and fell, rolling over her. The kicking beast was pulled quickly away by one of the men, and Miss Harriman, her habit torn and her ankles bruised, was helped out of harm's way. She was riding about a couple of days later. And she was riding that same bronco! Miss Harriman manages her coach and four with equal ease. She is a member of the Ladies' Coaching Club, and has had her lessons from that eminent English whip, Morris E. Howlett. Every spring she takes her turn at the ribbons on the run up to Arrowhead Inn, or Washington Heights, New York. Her girl friends and young society matrons are her passengers. Hunting to hounds is another favorite sport of Miss Harriman's. It is then that she makes a splendid figure in the saddle, and more than one man has to give way before her fearless, dashing riding behind the pack. She manages her hunter with the consummate skill that comes of long practice, and she holds her seat under the most trying conditions with the skill of a cowboy. Miss Harriman belongs to the Orange County Hunt, which covers one of the roughest bits of country around New York, but the hardest riding seems only to put her ahead of the ruck, further and further. At the annual Tuxedo Horse Show—this is near Arden, N. Y., where Mr. Harriman's great country place is situated—Miss Harriman is always sure of a ribbon for her mount. And at Southampton, L. I., where the Harrimans go in summertime, Miss Mary Harriman is always a factor in the riding and hunting set.

The Gibson-Foster Engagement

When the news of the engagement of May Gibson to Robert Foster leaked out a few days in advance of the formal announcement no one was the least bit surprised for everyone knew that May Gibson would marry a Foster. The two families have been intimate for years, but apart from that, the Foster boys all seem to have found a special attraction in the bride-elect. It is not so long ago that San Rafael was confident that there was an engagement, imminent if not actual, between her and Will Foster, and when he cut short the whispers of the gossips by his sudden and romantic marriage they took notice at once of the marked attentions of Arthur Foster, and now the official announcement is that it was really Robert Foster who was the favored one all the while. Miss Gibson is a bright, attractive girl, and the Foster family, so they say, are delighted with the match. Mary Foster's marriage is to take place in Easter week, and if rumor speaks truth there is still another Foster engagement shortly to be announced. As the young men of San Rafael have shown an inclination to go further afield in search of their life mates these two new engagements have met with the hearty approval of the society of the transbay city, since they indicate a disposition to patronize home markets.

Cabinet Wives

If Mrs. Taft has social ambition and is eager to make Washington a social center of some consequence, it is certain that she has valuable assistance available. The Cabinet is well supplied with tactful women of experience in high society. The most experienced of them is Mrs. Meyer, wife of the Secretary of the Navy, who was with her husband when he was Ambassador at Rome and St. Petersburg. She is popular in diplomatic circles, and she has two popular daughters. Mrs. Knox, by virtue of her husband's position, takes precedence at the head of the Cabinet women. Her home in K street is one of the fine homes of Washington, having been built by the late George W. Childs and purchased several years ago by the present Secretary of State. Before her marriage, Mrs. Knox was Miss Lillian Smith, daughter of A. D. Smith, president of one of Pittsburg's steel companies. She is a quiet, unassuming woman of culture and refinement. She does not mix much in gay society, but appears in dignified manner at the highest official functions. Since the days of the first McKinley administration, she has been an influential factor in Washington social life, particularly at the White House, though without appearing often in public. Mrs. Knox devotes most of her time to home and family. She never participates in political affairs, and during exciting campaigns she either goes abroad or retires to her country place at Valley Forge, Pa. This is a beautiful and secluded spot on the historical ground of Washington's winter camp of Revolutionary war days.

Two Other Social Queens

Mrs. MacVeagh, though perhaps the oldest of the Cabinet wives, will add interest to Washington social life. She is a woman of culture and attractive presence, a lavish entertainer, deeply interested in economic subjects, and possesses an acquaintance that extends around the world. She is the daughter of Henry S. Eames, a former banker of Chicago, and for many years she has taken a prominent part in the social affairs of that city. Among the notable organizations in which she has been a leading spirit are the Chicago Literary Club, the Twentieth Century Club and the Art Institute. Mrs. MacVeagh is classed as one of the Lake Shore Drive set, which Mrs. Potter Palmer dominates in Chicago. She has close friendship with Mrs. "Jack" Gardner of Boston, who sets fashions and fads for the Hub. She entertains numerous literary and artistic visitors, and Mrs. Patrick Campbell, the English actress, is a guest at the MacVeagh home whenever visiting Chicago. Eames MacVeagh, the only son of the family, is a bachelor, thirty-five years of age, and a leader in the social life of Chicago. He was one of the promoters of the recent Electric cotillon, which was the talk of the town for social magnificence. Though obliged to remain in Chicago to attend to his father's business interests, Eames MacVeagh is expected to visit occasionally the new home of his parents in Washington. Mrs. Dickinson, wife of the new Secretary of War, is a Southern woman, Nashville, Tenn., being her home, although for the last ten years she has passed most of her time in Chicago, where her husband's legal business required his presence. She is of a retiring disposition and has not mingled much in social life, except among a small circle of intimate friends, particularly those from the South. Her home in Erie street, Chicago, is known for its quiet but true Southern hospitality. Mrs. Dickinson has traveled extensively, accompanying her husband on many of his trips throughout America and Europe. She is interested in literature and art and is an excellent conversationalist, with a sense of humor seldom found among women. Her two eldest sons are settled in distant cities, but her youngest, now a student at Yale, will be seen later in Washington.

Mrs. Hearst to Entertain

On Saturday evening, March 20, Mrs. Phoebe Hearst will give a "Cruikshank" masquerade party to a number of her friends, at the beautiful Hacienda among the Pleasanton hills. The costumes are to be copied from the Cruikshank pictures, and as that famous early nineteenth century illustrator and caricaturist took his subjects from the public events of the day and reflected the spirit of his times, depicting characters which ranged from costers to kings, there is wide latitude of choice in both subject and costume. The guests will be assembled in the beautiful music room, which will be decorated with palms and flowers, and illuminated with myriads of electric lights. Mrs. Hearst, whose hospitality is famous on two continents, has planned a charming treat for her legion of friends.

Girls That Do Things

Following immediately on the marriage of Helen Thomas and Joseph Sefton, Mrs. Thomas and her younger daughter, Julia, will leave for an extended European trip. Both the Thomas girls believe in having a purpost in life, and while Helen's other aims have been diverted by her coming marriage, Julia is going to Europe with the idea of studying and improving herself during her travels. Alyce Warner is another of the girls not given over to frivolity. She is in Berlin now, cultivating her voice with a view to going on the operatic stage, and Elysa Partridge is still another of the serious minded, who has decided to take up the profession of nursing. Her desires have raised a storm of family opposition, but she has held to her course, and is to begin her noviciate in the near future. Her determination has caused sincere regret both in San Rafael and in Palo Alto, for she is an interesting girl, and very popular with her large coterie of friends. She is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Partridge, and sister of Miss Dorothy Partridge who showed so much courage at the time of the Marriott automobile fatality, when she was pinned beneath the overturned car. Elysa has just completed her course at Stanford, and her determination has come as no surprise to her friends, for she has always shown an inclination towards the serious side of life.

THE POTTER

SANTA BARBARA MILO M. POTTER

The Call of the Bank

Joseph Oliver Tobin, "Little Joe," is conspicuously absent from Coronado, in spite of his newly acquired love for polo. Instead, he is religiously staying at home and attending strictly to business, his late appointment to a directorship in the Hibernia Bank being the tie which binds. When asked the whence and whyfore of this sudden devotion to the stern realities of life he answered that with Uncle Dick away and Joseph Senior absent his presence at the bank was necessary to the making of a quorum. So it appears that things have come to a point where the Tobin famiily must make choice between polo and banking. They are shining lights in both firmaments, and one cannot dispense with their presence more than the other. "Little Joe," being only the nephew, and the junior acquisition to the bank, lost out on the polo deal. In a family of excellent players Dick Tobin is conceded to be the best, with Cyril Tobin ranking a close second. Every one was pleased to know that the accident of the other day was not serious and did not interfere with his prowess. He has made some of the best plays for Burlingame, though Tom Driscoll has really done the best work on the team, his sure, true strokes carrying the Burlingame side to victory every time. They tell me that Mrs. Tom, who accompanies him everywhere, is never happy until the polo season is over. Though she always sits on the side lines and cheers them on to victory, it is with the firm conviction in her heart that Tom is going to be killed, and her interest in each contest extends only to the rejoicing that it is one more over and done with. Her friends try to laugh her out of her fears, but it will be remembered that their wedding had to be postponed from the date originally set because of a serious accident which befel Tom at Del Monte, and as the Santa Barbara team has never been over friendly to him, she hails with delight the return to Burlingame. And meanwhile Tom goes on winning new trophies and fresh honors and covering hearted protests, she agrees with his friends that no game hearted protests, she agres with his friends that no game would really be complete without him.

Religion Separated Theme

Count George Von Polenz, who, as a guest at the Fairmont, is registered as plain George Von Polenz, Bakersfield, is a real, live, bona fide, genuine count, though with democratic simplicity he prefers the simple affix Mr. Not so his pretty wife, from whom he is living apart. Her cards bear the title, Countess Von Polenz, and she is proud of displaying the crest of the distinguished Austrian family. Count Von Polenz served in the regiment of His Majesty's Black Hussars, one of the highest honors to be conferred in the Austrian army. He came to this country several years ago, and lost his heart to the pretty daughter of a San Diego dentist. There was the usual joyful marriage followed by leisurely repentance. The Countess Von Polenz became a devout convert to a religious cult in which her husband had no faith and he says that religion has had a full share in bringing about the domestic disagreement. Count Von Polenz has offered to consent to a divorce on the grounds accepted by every state in the Union including Utah, but the Countess will not agree. Meanwhile he makes his home in Goldfield, where he has large mining interests and where Countess Von Polenz refuses to reside Besides his holdings in the Rawhide mines he has interests in the oil fields around Bakersfield. He is president of the Goldfield's Riding Club, which boasts of many millionaire members, and is the owner of a number of fine saddle horses.

eram, who played No. 1 for Ranelagh, and whose special duty was to worry the Burlingame back, was so surpassed in speed by Hobart that he abandoned the effort to ride him off. On the other hand, R. M. Tobin, No. 1 on the Burlingame team, kept Colonel D. J. Ross, the Ranelagh back, out of the game a good part of the time. Colonel Ross, however, played steadily and was of great service to his side. Early in the first period R. M. Tobin was struck on the cheek by a ball from a back-hander of Gill, and had to retire from the field for a few minutes, but he pluckily resumed his place and played an excellent game. Of the five Burlingame goals, Hobart, Tobin and Lawson each got one, and Driscoll two, while for Ranelagh F. A. Gill and Major Rotheram were the scorers. Having beaten its most dangerous opponent, there is reason to expect that Burlingame will score in the matches against Riverside, Los Angeles and Bryn Mawr. Major Colin G. Ross of Canada and Captain the Honorable M. E. Guest were the umpires in the Burlingame-Ranelagh match. Colonel D. J. Ross and Captain Guest officiated in the second contest between Bryn Mawr and Riverside teams. In the first two periods this game was very even, Riverside making the only goal, but in the third period the Bryn Mawr men began to score and at the end of the sixth period the record was six to one in favor of the Philadelphians, for whom Hugh Drury made four goals, Charles Wheeler one and Alexander Brown one. The Riverside goal was scored by W. FitzNave from a ball run down by H. G. Pattee. Though the game was good it lacked the speed and snap of the contest between Burlingame and Ranelagh. From the first day's showing it is not unlikely that the Bryn Mawr men will prove the superiors of all but the Burlingame team, which has not only faster ponies, but the advantage of being made up of men who know each other's play thoroughly. Bryn Mawr, too, will be somewhat handicapped by a strict application of the "off-side" rule, to which they seem comparatively unaccustomed. The Burlingame and the Ranelagh teams will probably come together again in the contest for the All America Trophy, which will begin on March 23, after the Round Robin for the championship of California and the John D. Spreckels Trophy is concluded.

Preparations for the banquet testimonial to Dr. Rupert Blue and the other "rat doctors' are going on apace. It will be held in the Red room of the Fairmont on the 31st of the month, and will be given in honor of the corps which presided over the cleaning up of San Francisco in such thorough style that government experts now pronounce it the most sanitary city in the world. Nearly all the city officials, many of the State officers and a number of the representative citizens will be present.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Charles Green, who have but recently returned from an extensive trip to the Hawaiian islands, expect to leave for New York at an early date on a journey which will combine pleasure and business. They will retain their apartments at the Fairmont, where they have made their home for the past two years.

The Fairmont well deserves its title of "A good place to entertain or to be entertained." Nearly every night the dining room is filled with jolly diner parties, while the larger and more formal ones are held in the special rooms. Only the other night there were given the P. G. McBean dinner of twelve covers; Mrs. William Fries' dinner in honor of Mrs. Hech, with sixteen covers; Colonel and Mrs. Howell's dinner to six guests; the Greenbaum party of eight, and the Coxey dinner of six.

Mr. and Mrs. William Kohl, who have spent the winter at the Fairmont, are preparing to go to their summer home at Tahoe at soon as the season opens.

Mrs. Edward Barron was hostess at a pretty luncheon at the Fairmont in honor of her young girl friends. Amongst those who were present were Miss Lucy Coleman, Miss Julia Langhorne, Miss Helen Baker, Miss Auguste Foute, Miss Elizabeth Simpson, Miss Helen Jones, Miss Jean Gallois, Miss Janet Coleman, Miss Lydia Hopkins.

Robert McKim, a prominent stock broker and clubman of New York, who is accompanied by his niece Miss F. M. Calla, a stunning Irish girl, have made the Fairmont their headquarters, while touring the coast and taking trips to points of interest.

Brittan, who has been spending the winter at the hotel, entertained a number of guests at a luncheon in compliment to Mrs. James Baldwin of Indianapolis, and on Wednesday night Mrs. J. H. Hough of Stockton was hostess at a dinner given to celebrate the birthday of her younger daughter, Laurette.

Odd Things in the World

Tradition says that "sack" was the last word uttered before the confusion of tongues at Babel, therefore all languages retain it. In Saxony it is "Saco"; Germany and Sweden, "Sack"; Irish and French, "Sac"; Latin, "Saccus"; Italian, "Sacco"; Spanish, "Saco"; Greek, "Sakkos"; Hebrew, "Sak," and so on.

The most costly picture frame in the world is one which encloses the "Virgin and Child" in the Milan Cathedral. It is made of hammered gold and the metal alone is worth $125,000.

No Cossack will change his clothing on a Monday, for it is believed that to do so would result in a skin disease. No meat must be pickled or corned on a Thursday. To be heedless in this observance would be to have the meat spoil within a fortnight. Wool is not spun on a holiday, else the cattle will sicken and die. A hen must be set always on an uneven number of eggs. Bones from the meals eaten at a funeral must be cast unto the river, or the dead will appear to the living in some peculiarly fearful shape. Bread at funeral meals must on no account be cut, but always broken.

In Persia there is a strange custom known as "bast," which is simply that any one having a grievance, by taking refuge on the premises of a nobleman, may demand that the noble take up the cause as though the "bastee" were a member of his family. There seems to be no limit to the custom, for the petty criminal often takes refuge in a mosque, where he is safe as long as he can procure food. If the police want him they must intercept his friends with supplies and literally starve him out. There was one occasion when a man having a small claim against the Persian government, sat for eight years in one of the legations. Ministers came and went, but he stayed on until his claim was settled. Few legations would have courage to put a man out and face the consequent storm of popular opprobium and annoyance that would follow.

A curious development is in steady progress in the Solomon Islands, the group in the South Pacific which lies to the west of New Guinea, whose people have earned such unenviable notoriety as head hunters. The young men of the tribes in these fertile and beautiful islands are abandoning the historic pursuit which has made them dreaded for centuries in the South Seas and are taking to the copra industry. Copra, which is the dried interior of the cocoanut, is valued commercially for the oil which can be pressed from it, and some of the young Solomon Islanders are accumulating considerable wealth by extracting it, though the older generation, to whom head hunting is still the only profession for a gentleman, are said to look down upon them as being "in trade."

BEAUTY THAT LASTS

Where is the woman who has not the praiseworthy desire to enhance her personal charms and preserve as long as possible her delightful power of enchantment, which lasts as long as her beauty? The Oriental Cream, prepared by Dr. T. Felix Gouraud of New York City, is a harmless preparation for preserving the delicacy of the complexion and removing blemishes. It is the favorite toilet article of the leading professional artists, who owe so much of their popularity to their personal charms. Scarcely a star dressing room in the land is without Gouraud's Oriental Cream, which is the most wholesome and perfect beautified known. Druggists will supply you.

A Drama Plunges England into Hysteria

What Carlyle called the "potbellied equanimity" of the British public has been rudely disturbed by the spectacular drama known as "An Englishman's Home," now being presented at Wyndham's Theatre in London. Produced by Frank Curzon anonymously and credited to a person who preferred to be known as "A Patriot," the authorship has now been acknowledged. Major Guy Louis. Busson Du Maurier, D. S. O., an officer in the Royal Fusiliers, now serving in South Africa, who is a son of the famous Punch artist and author of "Trilby," and a brother of Gerald Du Maurier, the clever actor who has done much to make J. M. Barrie the household word as a playwright that he is, turns out to be the author of the piece that has set all England talking. The play is a call to arms, a shriek for conscription, and, incidentally, a sneer at the volunteer forces of Great Britain. Opinions differ as to the merits of the drama as a drama, but of its amazing effects in arousing the public there can be no doubt. The Daily Mail has opened a sort of recruiting office of its own, and has already enrolled several thousand valiant warriors. The new Territorial Army of Mr. Haldane, which is designed to take the place of the old Volunteer and Yeomanry Corps, has received immense impulse. Messrs. Whitely, the enormous emporium and universal providers, have offered their employees three weeks' annual vacation on full pay on condition that they serve two weeks of the time in the Territorial Army camps. The Alliance Insurance Company have gone even further in requiring that all clerks entering their service shall be members of the Territorial force. Fifty thousand dollars was subscribed by an anonymous donor to further the enterprise of the press, and other sums of money continue to pour in. Lord Esher has lent his name and influence to the movement, and Sandow, the strong man, who conducts a physical culture establishment, has identified himself with the scheme by promising to build up would-be soldiers free of charge, so that if rejected as unfit at the first application they will be able to pass the physical tests at the second attempt. The theatre has been packed nightly and the wily recruiting sergeants have made the most of this opportunity. Stationing themselves at the theatre exits, they have seized upon the susceptible and impulsive youths and hurried them hot-footed to the recruiting stations. Five hundred to a thousand soldiers in embryo have been snapped up per night. Even the staid English press have become hysterical. The grave Westminister Gazette is devoting editorials to the play and the one-cent papers are giving columns to discussions on the subject. England has "invasion" on the brain. The "flannelled fools at the wicket" and the "muddied oafs at the goal," whom Kipling scorned, have had a rude awakening. The scorn heaped upon the football enthusiasts in the play, the limerick-making timewasters and the pettifogging amusements of the middle class British family lashed by Major Du Maurier, have had the moral effect of a crusade. People are asking, Where is the phlegm, the imperturbability, the self-confidence and scorn of the Britisher? Mafficking night was the forerunner of British excitability. The antics of the suffragettes have grieved the judicious with a sense of degeneracy in the race. And now comes this furore of excitement over a play which nobody claims is first class, and which, as critics point out, entirely ignores the existence of a mighty navy. The concession to popularity in altering the denouement into a final triumph for the British arms has reassured people somewhat, for the original termination which left the invader in full possession, was altogether too much for British pride. Mr. J. M. Barrie is said to be responsible for this improvement.

"Out of the Fold"

This comedy melodrama has been drawing full houses all week at the Valencia. In addition to the regular stock company, a litter of carefully manicured little pigs, a tame lamb and a horse are in the cast. In justice to the animals, it must be said that they deserved all the applause they got, even if the tiny porkers were a little off in their entrances and exists and had to be helped on and off with a broom. After the opening night they may have been more regardful of their cues. "Out of the Fold" has all the appropriate features of the regular drama,—the heart interest centered in the repentant heroine with the spotted past, the villain who pursues her, and the noble young hero who does the rescue stunt. We have seen them all before in the hearth and home drama. Langdon McCormick, the playwright, has added some telling comedy and character features to the hackneyed old plot and has evolved a better result than one might expect. The Valencia stock company does well with the various character parts, and gives a good snappy performance. Mace Greenleaf is manly and convincing as the young schoolmaster. Blanche Stoddard made the most of her weepy part as the persecuted heroine. Darrell Standing as Big Jim, the sheep herder, did some really good work, and made a decided hit. Lillian Andrews, as the village gossip, Blanche Nichols, the romping school girl, Gerald Harcourt and Gilmore Walker, the village boobies, Charles Dow Clark, as Pinchbeck, the editor, and Peggy Monroe as Lucy, the school girl with the mumps are all good. The piece is prettily staged.

"The Right of Way."

A great love story is always appreciated by the American theatregoer. "The Right of Way," by Sir Gilbert Parker, contains a theme as touching as that of Damon and Pythias. The dramatization of this fine work by Eugene Presbrey, the successful adapter of "Raffles," and produced by Klaw and Erlanger, will be presented week, beginning next Monday night, and including matinees Wednesday and Saturday. Guy Standing and Theodore Roberts are specially featured by the management in the respective roles of "Charley Steele" and "Joe Portugais." The scenes of the play are laid in Charley Steele's "Den" in Montreal, the Cote Dorian, on the banks of the St. Lawrence and in a hut on the Vendome Mountains. In the fifth and last scene, the valley of Cooling Springs, the play materially departs from the book, death does not come to Charley Steele, but the play ends with his glorified renunciation and not without hope of future happiness.

Second Bispham Concert

David Bispham will give his second concert on Sunday afternoon at Christian Science Hall. The program, which will interest all music lovers is as follows: "In questa Tomba Oscura"; "Creation's Hymn," Beethoven; "An die Leyer"; "Der Wanderer," Schubert. "In Waldeseinsamkeit"; "Standchen"; "Wir Wandelten"; "O liebliche Wangen"; Brahms. "Marie"; "Liebschen is da!"; "Im Mai"; Franz. "Heimweh"; "Der Tambor"; Hugo Wolf. "Allerseelen"; "Lied des Steinklopfers"; Richard Strauss. "Alf through the Night"; Old Welsh. "Where be Going?" (arranged by Somervell) Old English. "Annie Laurie," Old Scotch. "The Stuttering Lovers," (arranged by Hughes); "Believe me if all those endearing young charms," Old Irish. Seats are on sale at Sherman Clay & Co.'s until five on Saturday evening and on Sunday at the box office at the hall, which will open at ten.

Ade's Funny Sultan

"The Sultan of Sulu" which is now the attraction at the Princess is one of George Ade's absurdities. Knowledge of this fact ought to be conclusive of its worth as a mirth-producer. George Ade has yet to fail in his efforts to provoke the loud guffaw. When he wrote the amusing hodgpodge of comicalities which is now splitting sides at the Princess he was just getting a foothold on the stage and it was this piece that won for him the discriminating taste of Broadway. It was in this piece, too, that Frank Moulan first vindicated his ability as a comedian. Prior to his appearance on Broadway as the Sultan he was an idol of the provinces, and like all provincial mummers he longed for the opportunity to make good on Broadway. Ade gave him the opportunity and he seized it with a strong grip. This same Moulan is now a stock actor in San Francisco. He is the moving spirit of the show at the Princess and he is giving a performance that is full of ginger. But Moulan is not the whole show. There is so much talent in this Princess comedy company that despite the preponderating opportunities of the star you are always conscious of the fact that there are others and that they are worth while. May Boley, for example, a mighty clever woman, and Helen Darling and Zoe Barnett and James Stevens and incidentally a rattling good chorus, pleasing to look upon and good to hear.

The Last Lyric "Pop" Concert

The last of the "Pop" concerts at Lyric Hall will be given on Sunday afternoon, March 28. On this occasion it will be "An Afternoon with Schubert" and the program will include a quintette for two violins, two cellos and viola, a group of songs and a trio for piano, violin and cello. The assisting artists will be Mrs. Celia Decker Cox, contralto, Miss Therese Ehrman, pianist, Miss Lydia Reinstein, accompanist, and Alfred Nielsen, violoncellist. Manager Greenbaum has reason to congratulate himself on the successful series of the highest class chamber music concerts ever given in San Francisco. Seats will be read next Thursday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

GUY STANDING AND THEODORE ROBERTS

"Blue Grass" at the Alcazar

Of all the plays built around a horse race, "Blue Grass," which is to be the Alcazar's offering next Monday night and throughout the week, is by long odds the best. It had a long run on Broadway last year. It was written by Paul Armstrong, author of "Salomy Jane" and "The Heir to the Hoorah." "Blue Grass" is redolent of Kentucky and of the gentleman breeders of the region where the best thoroughbreds are developed. You know that in every racing play everything depends upon a certain horse and its winnings, and you know that the horse will win, but Mr. Armstrong has dared to have his maiden, Blue Grass, win long before the final two settings of the play are presented and yet he sustains interest until the final speech in the last act. The play appeals to big elemental emotions. Much of the sentiment has to do with the simple affection of a gray-haired darkey for the glistening old mare, My Lady. When he says, "Ah reckon yo' know yo' baby is racin' in Looeyville," and a bit later, when he describes the great day when My Lady herself stepped out on a track like paper, "Like she wah 'fraid she'd break it," and then told of the race that she won—her last race it was—a stoic would find the inclination to applaud irresistible.

"The Gingerbread Man"

The last performance of Luder's and Pixley's always pleasing "The Burgomaster," will be given at the American Theatre this Saturday afternoon and evening and at the Sunday matinee "The Gingerbread Man," Rankin and Sloane's tuneful comic opera, or musical fantasy, as it is termed by them, will pay this city a return visit for one week only and with matinees Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday. "The Gingerbread Man" broke all records here last season. The cast contains many names that have been connected with it since its inception and Rose Snow and Fred Nice, the two principal funmakers of last year, are still with the company. Many important improvements have been made in the book and, with the aid of the composer, some interpolations have been added that are described as being immensely amusing without tending to disturb the continuity of the story in any way.

"The Halfbreed"

The last performances of that delightful pastoral comedy-melodrama, "Out of the Fold," will be given at the Valencia Theatre this Saturday and Sunday afternoons and evenings and on Monday night "The Halfbreed," a stirring story of adventure, written by two Californians, Oliver Morosco and Harry Cottrell, will be presented for the first time in San Francisco. The scenes are laid in the Indian Territory and the action keeps pace with the strenuous existence incidental to any newly developed country. Ross Kennion, a young man of means and affairs, loves Evelyn Huntington, the daughter of a Territorial Judge, but with him, as ever before, the course of true love runs unevenly. Kennion has been unhappily married and with his young son, Dick, he lives apart, waiting for the day which shall free him from his matrimonial bonds and allow him to tell Evelyn of his love. The Halfbreed, Spavinaw, educated, almost white, also loves the girl, and finding his own suit rejected, sets about blackening Kennion in Evelyn's estimation. At first he is successful, but when he seeks further to jeopardize the life of the young man, the girl's respect for Kennion asserts itself and she even takes opprobrium upon herself in order to save him. This occurs in a scene of strong dramatic value in Kennion's cabin at night. Incidentally there is a raid by Indians and a sensational storm effect. In the end it is proven that the Indians have been led in their depredations by Spavinaw, and all suspicion of Kennion's complicity is dispelled. Evidence is then brought forth which enables

Ossip Gabrielowitsch

The last of the great pianists to be heard this season will be the brilliant young Russian, Ossip Gabrielowitsch and his appearance will have an additional interest, coming after that of his friend, confrere and compatriot, Josef Lhevinne. Though both are Russians and both great artists, they are of quite a different genre. Where Lhevinne dazzles with his brilliancy and power, Gabrielowitsch, reaches the sympathy of his hearers in quite a different manner. Where both are equally fine it is a matter of taste which to prefer. In addition to his skill as a performer, Gabrielowitsch has a talent for composition, and a number of his orchestral works have been performed by the great symphony orchestras of Europe. He is likewise gifted as a painter, and a portrait of Rubinstein in oils done by him recently took first honors at the St. Petersburg Academy. The dates for the Gabrielowitsch concerts are Friday night, April 2nd, Sunday afternoon, April 4th, and Tuesday night, April 6th, at Christian Science hall. On Wednesday afternoon, April 7th, he will appear in Oakland at "Ye Liberty Playhouse." On Easter Sunday Gabrielowitsch will be the soloist at the first annual Easter Festival Concert for which Manager Greenbaum has organized a great chorus and orchestra.

The Shakespeare Lecture

William Shakespeare of London, famous as composer, pianist, orchestral conductor and master of singing, will give two lectures at Christian Science hall. Throughout the world of music he is considered an authority, and his lectures on "The Art of Singing" have been for many years an important part of the course at the Royal Academy of London. Some of the most renowned singers in the world have studied with him, amongst whom may be mentioned David Bispham and Ffrangon Davis. Mr. Shakespeare is not making a professional tour. He has been visiting Southern California for the benefit of his wife's health, and Manager Greenbaum has induced him to give our students and teachers the benefit of his long and wide experience while spending a few days in the city. On Saturday afternoon, April 3, he will speak on "The Art of Singing," and on Monday night, April 5th, on "Singing Considered Historically," illustrated with excerpts to show the styles of the great composers. Seats for these lectures, which will be of the greatest importance to all interested in the art of song, will be $1 for admission and $1.50 for reservations. In comparison with London prices for Mr. Shakespeare's instruction, this will give our music lovers about twenty dollars' worth of value for a nominal sum. Mail orders for seats should be addressed now to Will L. Greenbaum, care of Sherman, Clay & Co.

"Merely Mary Ann" in Oakland

The offering for theatre-goers across the bay next week at the Liberty Playhouse will be "Merely Mary Ann," the piece with which Eleanor Robson's name has so long been associated. It will be the initial presentation of this clever play in Oakland at popular prices, and with the careful production it is certain to receive at the hands of the Liberty management should prove a successful attraction. "Merely Mary Ann" is probably the best dramatic work of Israel Zangwill, the brilliant English author whose newest play, "The Melting Pot," is creating so much talk in New York and Chicago. It is a delightful little comedy, full of clean humor—the sort of play to which one can take mother, sister or daughter without fear or hesitancy, which means much now-a-days. The play deals with the fate of a little English slavey, who falls in love with a young and talented, but very poor musician, Launcelot. Mary Ann afterwards falls heir to a fortune left her by a brother who struck oil in America, and as the composer, also, by that time, has achieved renown in the musical field, the play ends happily with the marriage of Mary Ann and Launcelot. In the Liberty production of the play, Miss Katharine Mulkins, a young lady who has just arrived from New York City to join the company, makes her Oakland debut in the name part, and Landers Stevens will be seen as Launcelot. In the remaining roles will be found all the favorites of the company, and the usual careful scenic production will be provided. "Merely Mary Ann" is announced for the usual run of one week, with the regular Saturday and Sunday matinees.

Orpheum Vaudeville

Violet Black, a remarkably clever, attractive and popular young actress will head the Orpheum program next week and will present a diverting sketch called "In the Subway," by Edgar Allen Woolf, the action of which takes place in New York's underground tunnel of traffic, "the tube." Apart from the novelty of its scene Miss Black's little play possesses an interesting and original story brightened up by amusing situations and witty dialogue. As Betty Trimble she is scoring an even greater personal hit than she did in her well remembered "A West Point Regulation." The Four Poncherrys will make their first appearance in this city. The party consists of one lady and three gentlemen, all of whom are famous in the European Music Halls as aerial acrobats and daring and expert wire performers. James H. Cullen, the humorous raconteur and monologist, is sure of flattering recognition for he is firmly established in popular favor. "The man from the west" as he is generally called on this coast is thoroughly progressive and never fails to introduce on each of his visits entirely novel material. Silbon's Novelty Circus is an act which is expected to score a great hit. It is from the Hippodrome, London. It includes some beautiful cats who are wonderful examples of what can be accomplished by patience, skill and kindness in the tuition of animals. While one of the clowns is turning rapid somersaults one of the cats manages to spring and secure hold on its master's clothing and actually loops the loop. Next week will terminate the engagement of Ray L. Royce, The Blessings; McDonald and Huntington, and the Eight Palace Girls and James Clemons. A new series of interesting Motion Pictures will be a pleasant finale to a most pleasing performance.

In the Limelight

Otis Skinner will play an engagement at the Van Ness Theatre, next month and is to bring his latest dramatic triumph, "The Honor of the Family."

"Pretty Peggy," Frances Neva Aymar's love story of Peg Woffington and David Garrick, which will follow "The Halfbreed at the Valencia Theatre, ran for two hundred nights in New York and one hundred nights in Chicago. In the coming production full advantage will be taken of the opportunity afforded by the period of the play, for the display of beautiful costumes of the eighteenth century.

One of the promising attractions coming to the American Theatre is Daniel Sully's new play, "The Matchmaker," in which the distinguished actor and comedian is winning the greatest success of his long and brilliant career.

Rose Murray, the soubrette with the dainty pedal extremities, is the Margery Daw of this season's "Gingerbread Man" and is creating a sensation with the new song, "Waggie Was There With Her Hair in a Braid."

No star has a more extensive trip this season than that which Madame Nazimova started at Washington in September and will end at Minneapolis late in June. For two years Nazimova remained in New York and on her first road tour this year there were many demands for contracts for her appearance. She has played already as far west as Omaha, returned east and appeared in Toronto and in arranging the bookings for the all star season at the Van Ness the management induced her to return west.

Jessie Mae Hall will be brought to the Valencia Theatre especially to play the part of "Wendy" in Peter Pan. She is now making a great hit in the role in the production at the Burbank Theatre, Los Angeles.

So great has been the demand for seats for "The Gingerbread Man" at the American Theatre that the management has decided to give two extra matinees, next Wednesday and Thursday

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

At this season there is always more interest in the fabrics and models for Sack suits than in other matters of masculine attire, and while fashion has not been more prodigal than usual in change of cut, never, perhaps was there more diversity in detail of finish. Reference has been made here or there in these articles as to length and shape or lines of back so that it is doubtful if any one who has read them regularly can have failed to learn that exaggeration in these respects is lacking in this year's styles and this applies as well to exclusive as to general fashions.

Here and there, it is true, one may see an exceptionally long or short jacket and a decidedly loose or decidedly form fitting back, but extreme length and much cut in at the waist are decidedly bad form, while on the other hand exaggerated shortness, even if indicating what the next extreme is likely to be, is not now in vogue. Medium is the word that best expresses the cut of coats turned out by the leading tailors, and this means a length say of 32 inches for a man 5 feet 9 inches tall and a back showing but little spring, and having no special effect of creased seams or flare below the waist line. When one looks back over a number of years the changes become quite apparent. From one season to another, save in rare cases, it is difficult to see that the fashions have undergone any change whatever, yet it may be said now that compared to last fall, collars are wider and the notches in lapels less deep; that there is less attention paid to the extreme broad shouldered effect, that the front shows a tendency to have its corners rounded more. Pockets and sleeves should be perfectly plain this season and as little machine stitching as possible should show on coat.

Concerning Sack coat waistcoats, there is little to be said other than that the opening at the neck is medium, that lapels are less to be worn than the plain finish and that there are moderate points at the bottom. Trousers are cut straight and pegtops have gone entirely out of style. The turned up finish at the bottom is neither more nor less correct than it has been for the past half dozen years, but nowadays nearly all trousers are made with belt loops and it is best to have small buckles at the side of the band.

benefit, the farmer having parted with his cotton at the very lowest prices of the year and for many a season. Truly, the tillers of the soil have drunk their full of the cup of bitterness and are now clamoring for a genuine anti-bucketshop bill in lieu of the existing anti-future law, which they want rescinded. The Texas Legislature is now in session and should these laws be so modified as to permit the resumption of legitimate speculation, the addition to the market of this new buying power would in itself suffice to advance prices sharply.

Ideas about the size of this crop must be revised once more as things now point lower than the popular figure of 13,500,000; supplies must now be drawn from well-protected stocks in second hands, and this can hardly be done without advance in price, unless new crop prospects should become very promising for a large yield the coming season which they are certainly not at present.

In addition to drought in west Texas, the New York Financial Chronicle reports the rainfall excessive in Alabama and Tennessee and in some localities elsewhere. The Mississippi river is at high stage and rising and very high water is reported in Alabama rivers. Where the precipitation has been heavy very little farm work has been possible and at times has been completely suspended.

In summing up the situation after a close study of all data before us which we are able to accumulate, and realizing that Cotton is $6.00 per bale below ruling prices at this time last year and is now hardly if any above cost of production, we fail to find any justification for changing our bullish sentiment.

ance of my soul upon somebody. Nothing, nobody can help me; when I entered that jurybox I left hope behind. All I lack to complete the shame of my condition are the stripes and even that difference between a discretionary juror within Judge Lawlor's jurisdiction is not great nor essential, for there are no stripes on J. Dalzell Brown nor on the boodling supervisors whose crimes are the source of my own disgraceful and debased plight.

How can I ever find courage to look my honest fellow citizens in the face after my term of imprisonment expires? What shall I say to them when they shall ask me why Judge Lawlor suspected me? How can I tell what was passing in the mind of Judge Lawlor when he sentenced me to this indefinite term "in the custody of the sheriff?" I can say nothing; even as a convict, exposed to his unwitting employer can say nothing when confronted by proof of his shameful previous condition of servitude. I cannot even plead that my picture is not in the rogues's gallery, for has it not been printed frequently in the columns of the press? I cannot say that I am different from the inmate of San Quentin because I did not work in the jute mill, for there are convicts in San Quentin who do not work in the jute mill. I cannot say that I was granted superior privileges to those given to convicts at San Quentin or Folsom, for in those State Prisons the inmates live on better food than they have been accustomed to in their days of freedom, their cells are warm and their blankets are clean; and they walk sometimes in the sunlight and amuse themselves in innocent or healthful exercises. Surely there is little difference between the condition of a juror in the Calhoun case imprisoned by "discretion" of Judge Lawlor, and a prisoner of the State imprisoned under sentence of the law under discretion of this same Judge Lawlor—except that the State prisoner knows when his term of imprisonment will end and lives in constant hope of immediate parole.

This, my dear Democritus, is all I have to say at this time. I have relieved myself of a little of my burden, and I hope that you will not blame me too harshly for asking you to hear it for me. You are free and stainless; I am in jail and disgrace. I attach this surreptitious communication to the butt of my last cigar and drop it from the tenth story of my prison, at midnight, hoping that some sympathizing passerby on the pavement below will pick it up and convey it to its address.

Farewell for a time my friend at large, and think of me as I am, not as I was or as I ought to be.

JURYBIRD.

The Last Lesson

the address with some difficulty: "Madame Mechut, Rosoy-en-Brie."

She began to laugh happily all to herself. "I can read! I can read!" Then she thought: "Yes, but I know the words written there by heart. That guides me. Perhaps I shan't be able to read what's inside the letter itself. Let's try, at any rate."

She broke open the envelope, settled her spectacles on her nose, and unfolded the sheet.

At the top were printed words. She read: "Military Hospital." As it gave her some trouble to make this out, she paid it little attention. The rest was written with a pen, in official characters: that was more difficult still. Concentrating her whole attention upon the lines, she spelled out:

Madame: I regret to inform you that the soldier Bechut, of the 54th Regiment of the Line, died yesterday.

She passed her hands across her eyes. The syllables she had so painfully pieced together conveyed almost no meaning to her. But there was one word that scared her: died.

A second time she set herself to the task, and, being now more familiar with the characters, she read again, almost straight off, half aloud:

Madame: I regret to inform you that the soldier Bechut, of the 54th Regiment of the Line, died yesterday.

She rose up straight and uttered a cry: "Ah, my God!"

She had risen with so abrupt a movement that her primer flew on to the hearth and the slate dropped to the floor and was broken. She collapsed into her arm-chair. With dilated eyes that saw not, pressing the horrible letter between her hands, she sat staring at the hearth with its writhing flames.

At this very moment in came the school-master. He saw only her back as she sat motionless, and said gaily:

"Hey, mamma! How lazy we are! Wake up! It's lesson-time."

But she held out the letter, sobbing: "Oh, monsieur, monsieur! It's no use now—I can read!"

The clock ticked softly on in its case. The dog lay curled up by the fire. At his crouched the great cat with her paws tucked in, gazing at the fire through half-closed eyes, and the old woman sat crying—crying.

¶ Efficiency is the only logical basis for comparison of an automobile. Few persons appreciate that fact. Ask any Studebaker-Garford owner; he'll tell you in a word that it's due to the higher efficiency of the Studebaker-Garford that he is the owner of one.

¶ Regardless of rating these cars excel in year-in-and-year-out performance. If an owner wants a new model he always wants a later one of the same make. Therefore, he brings his old car to us—for, better than anyone else, we know and appreciate its value.

¶ Let us send you a list of owners of Studebaker-Garford cars-men of prominence who have driven their machines three, four and five years. Let their verdict determine your choice.

Auto Notes

One of the most enthusiastic motorists in the city is Fred Butler, the well known stage manager of the Alcazar. Besides making numerous trips to San Jose and other interior places, Butler uses his Oldsmobile to attend to the details of the theatre, and probably spends more time in his car than does any other automobilist in the city.

The question is often asked: "How long will a motor truck stay in active commission?" An exact reply is impossible because every individual truck operates under different circumstances, performs different service and may have different care. Examples of what some trucks have done, however, show that a good truck is capable of much longer service than ordinarily would be suspected. The Packard Motor Car Company, of Detroit, Michigan, uses its own three-ton truck exclusively in its local hauling. The Packard Company's No. 4 truck was put into service in 1907. It has been actually in service 522 days, during which it has covered 16,489 miles. Its principal work has been in hauling express and freight between the Packard factory and the different railway freight depots. The truck, in the time it has been in use, has made 1373 trips and has hauled 7,833,022 pounds of freight, or, approximately, 4,000 tons. Its tonnage per day has been 15,006 pounds and its average tonnage per trip, 5,705 pounds. The gasoline consumed in these 522 days of work has been 3,548 gallons, or an average of 4.64 miles per gallon. The truck has just been put into the shop for repainting and overhauling, and, as soon as this is accomplished will be placed again in the regular service.

Incidents bordering on the dramatic, in which six pretty show girls of the "Marrying Mary," company played a conspicuous part, fell to the lot of a party of autoists which made the first run of the season to the Muir Woods last week in a Studebaker "forty" car. Four times on the trip, which consumed the entire day, the machine, carrying nine passengers, became stuck in mud holes and each time extrication from the difficulties approached closer to an impossible task. The experience was not devoid of human interest features, for, while pulling the big Studebaker out of the last mud hole, the girls of the party feeling the pangs of hunger and knowing that the men had no time to spare from their labors with the automobile, were forced to canvass the neighborhood and obtain food from the residents to provide a lunch.

Should the present efforts of the California Motor Club to have the New York to Seattle endurance run come via Los Angeles and San Francisco, be successful, a great many of the local automobile owners would undoubtedly join the tour, making the last stretch of the journey with the eastern motorists. "I would join the tour with my six-cylinder Thomas," said John P. Costello of this city. "The trip would be a good test for all of the cars and contestants and I would like the chance of showing what my car can do." A great many other local owners of automobiles will take the same view as Costello and welcome any chance to test the speed and durability of their cars with those of the eastern states. As California ranks third in the number of cars owned, in the United States, the showing of the native motorists would undoubtedly be a great one.

Deliveries of Buick "White Streaks" were made this week by the Howard Automobile Company as follows: Louis Groff, Santa Rosa; Phillip Weihman, Santa Rosa; Dr. Charles Richards, San Jose; A. C. Kuhn, San Jose; W. F. Collins, Oakland; Guynn & Morgan, Chico; F. F. Field, Alameda; Joseph Oppenheim, Oakland; Fred Schneider, Stockton; Oscar Marshall, Stockton; Charles Moreing, Stockton; Julius Meyer, San Francisco; Fred Kahn, San Francisco; S. G. Herzog, San Francisco.

R. J. Seller left yesterday in his 20-horse-power Oldsmobile touring car for a short trip through the San Joaquin Valley. Seller, though having had his car but a few weeks, is already an expert driver and has made several tours to the interior of the state on which occasions he has handled the little car cleverly. He will be away several days on this run.

A difficulty which confronted the management at the Detroit auto show a few weeks ago was how to get a number of heavy cars up to the second floor of the show building, especially when the runway allowed by the city gave a rise of thirteen feet in forty, slightly over 30 per cent grade. It was finally accomplished by using a Studebaker M-M-F "30," attached to one end of a block and tackle, after a truck had failed to appear and the use of horses scorned. At first the car was unable to secure traction, its wheels spinning even though chains were on the tires. By loading a number of heavy men into the tonneau it was overcome and several heavy cars pulled up the steep incline, one limousine weighing 5,500 pounds.

Among the well known motor owners who will make a country trip tomorrow is Dr. H. A. Brown of this city and Yreka. Brown has just arrived from the northern town in his Thomas Flyer and says the roads are in terrible condition. San Jose, and possibly Santa Cruz, will be among the places Brown will visit tomorrow.

"The Under Groove"

Despite the fact that one almost needs a thieves' lexicon and a burglar's handbook in order to understand all the references in "The Under Groove," it makes "mighty interesting reading"; though it does bring to mind the question of a child of long ago—in the days when children were regaled on better mental diet than juveniles and warmed over classics. The little miss, deeply engaged in the perusal of "Paradise Lost," gravely asked whether it was quite right for Milton to have made Satan so interesting. The hero of "The Under Groove," and I call him hero advisedly, engages the sympathy of the reader from the first paragraph, despite his being an expert thief and a clever wire tapper. He has courage, initiative and intelligence, and his adventures and escapades are hair-raising enough to satisfy the most exacting. There is a mystery surrounding him and his position in the world, which is hinted at in a shadowy way from time to time in his soliloquizings, but it is evident that he is at as much of a loss to account for it himself as the reader is. The solution, which is eminently satisfactory, is furnished in the final chapter, and "The Adventure of the End and the Beginning" rounds out the curious career, when the daring adventurer, victim of an accident, awakes to his old self and discovers his own identity. There are eight "adventures," the titles of which are in themselves a lure to the reader: The Third Arm, the Unknown Door, the Black Company, the Private Wire, the Time Lock, the Emerald Pendant, and the Travis Coup, though each independent of the rest are yet bound together through the personality of the chief actor and the reappearance, from time to time, of other characters. Arthur Stringer has made over to himself the field of the wire-tapper, the tamperer with telegraphy, and "The Under Groove" does not fall below "The Wire Tappers" and "Phantom Wires" in the matter of absorbing interest. Published by McClure.

A Political Romance

The title of Emerson Hough's new novel, "54-40 or Fight," fixes at once the historical period and at least a few of the principal characters. It is, of course, a political romance and a stirring narrative of a stirring time, but though the action extends over the year of the Mexican War and the first great trek of emigration to the West, it is not, singularly enough, with courts and camps, oratory or military display that our minds are occupied. The narrative is related by Nicholas Trist, private secretary of John C. Calhoun and confidential agent of that long-sighted statesman. Calhoun is decidedly the hero of the romance, the one important figure without whom all things would have gone amiss, though, old and ill as he is, he never leaves the national capital. Mr. Hough has taken us behind the scenes indeed, and introduced us to the powers who we have always flattered ourselves were seated only behind thrones. The acquisition of both Mexico and Oregon are shown to have been brought about by women and a skilful use of the motives which rule their movements and react upon the men whom it is so often necessary to influence. The woman paramount in this instance is the Baroness Helena von Ritz, a most fascinating adventuress, avowedly the secret agent of England and suspected of being much more. Intrigue is hers by second nature, and she plays as skilfully with Van Zandt as the representative of the republic of Texas and Iturrio, minister from Mexico, as she does with Sir Richard Pakenham of England. She holds the key of the situation, and it is Calhoun's task to place the hand of his confidential agent on that key and turn it in the lock. That the United States today includes both the desired territories, even if not quite to the line of 54-40, is proof that the design was successfully executed. There is nothing hysterical or exaggerated about Mr. Hough's presentation, no heat of partisan politics and fire-eating orators. We get more than hints of character and motives, but Mr. Trist is a calm and self contained narrator whose cool judgment carries conviction. There is a pretty love story, but the main interest is historical, and the incidental descriptions of Washington as it was in the middle of the nineteenth century, of the long journey over the Oregon trail, and the discomfort of the settlers cheerfully borne for the sake of homes, are well worth while. The Baroness von Ritz is, after all, a pathetic figure, a victim of one of those visionary ill-timed efforts to "improve the race" which so often end in ruining the individual. Despite her stormy career she cannot be called a bad woman. And her old father is scarcely less pathetic than the child whose existence and misfortune were primarily his responsibility. John C. Calhoun has been variously represented in history, but for the most part he has been condemned. Mr. Hough is a doughty champion of the old statesman. The story should interest the people of the West on its own merits. It should make a special appeal to our own city where there is the additional interest of noting the outcropping of ancestral traits in our own Mr. Calhoun. Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Co.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Cynic—Yes, Hiram Johnson is still a member of the local bar. No, apparently he has not greatly increased his practice by his ostentatious zeal as a civic patriot. However his connection with the graft prosecution has not proved to his disadvantage. He was attorney for Dalzell Brown.

Taxpayer—Yes, Supervisor Connolly was on friendly terms with Mayor Schmitz. Your information respecting his efforts to get a job from Schmitz after the earthquake, is, we believe, reliable. Mr. Connolly is today one of our most ardent reformers. We do not know the measure of his ability, as he has never had an opportunity to exhibit it in his private life. However there is no doubt that he has the confidence of the people. The taxpayers stand ready to intrust Mr. Connolly, Mr. Murphy and Mr. Giannini with the thirty or forty millions that will be required to bring water from Hetch-Hetchy. Yes, we know Jim Booth. He is a professional supervisor and is quite willing to work at it for the rest of his life.

Tom Knocker—No, we do not know the name of the assemblyman representing the thirty-ninth district. We give no information in this column which requires research. We believe you are right in your conjecture that it was the gentleman from the 39th who attacked Senator Perkins, but his name has escaped our memory. It is now thrown into the discard.

TRYING IT ON THE DOG

"What do you think of the poem, honestly, now?" said Rondo, after reading his last effusion to Snooper.

"Candidly, old fellow," replied his friend, "I can't for the life of me tell what you are driving at."

"Good!" exclaimed the poet ecstatically. "Then I can sell it to one of the leading magazines."

THE REASON.

She smiled upon his suit,
Oh, lucky, lucky lad!
She smiled upon his suit,
And yet he was not glad.

His coat was all awry,
His trousers bagged to boot;
And that's the reason why
She smiled upon his suit!

A Groundless Objection

There could not be a law devised by human ingenuity more indefensible and infamous than the so-called "Change of Venue" bill. So we are told by a fearless press in impassioned language which has been supplemented by copious and veracious discourse from the pliable mouth of that illustrious professional agitator, the Hon. Andrew Furuseth. The editors of the Call and Bulletin and their valuable co-adjutor of the sailors' union have cast their penetrating and luminating minds in the very midst and marrow of this subject, and in a well-timed outburst of really startling intelligence and wisdom they have disclosed the subterranean motives with which the authors of the vicious measure are inspired. The measure was designed in the interest of criminals, says the Call. Furthermore "it is intended to facilitate the processes that have brought the administration of law and justice in this commonwealth into contempt and made it a byword and a reproach all over America." Furuseth tells us that the bill "would place a weapon in the hands of the corporations to discourage poor litigants in personal damage suits." He explains that under this measure a corporation could disqualify one judge after another. This assertion the Call amiably corroborates and adds, "The law, in fact, would place in the hands of corporations virtual power to select the judge they wanted, the judge on whom influence could be brought to bear." From this lucid analysis of the inevitable consequences of the measure there can be no dissent provided we assume that the veracious commentators are not in error respecting its scope. But this assumption is not imperative. Indeed it is entirely unwarranted. The bill does not provide for the disqualification of an indefinite number of judges. Nay, it provides for the disqualification of only one judge. This being the fact obviously the objections urged by Mr. Furuseth and the other representatives of the Spreckels' oligarchy are groundless. All the objections which they have advanced are based on the assumption that the bill empowers a litigant to pick his own judge. So apparently the editors have no objection to the disqualification of only one judge; but as a matter of fact they have as it is not favorable to their designs. Too bad they went off half cocked. If they had read the bill before commenting thereon they might have employed clever sophistry in arguing the mischievousness of it, but now it appears that the only rational objection to be urged against the bill is one that is utterly without reason. Thus we see that they lose on a paradox.

The "Fair Play" Law

As soon as Mr. Furuseth reads the bill he will probably call a meeting of the sailors' union to have it endorsed. We say "probably" because we are not sure that Mr. Furuseth is more zealous for the interests of organized labor than for the designs of the civic patriots who are intent upon sending malefactors in possession of desirable franchises to jail. Mr. Furuseth is usually to be depended upon for hortatory performance when the welfare of the masses is in issue, but even the most vigilant lovers of mankind have occasionally fallen asleep at their self-appointed post. So that Mr. Furuseth shall have no excuse to plead in mitigation of negligence in this matter we take this opportunity of informing him that the bill to which he objected under misapprehension is in full force and effect in eleven States of the Union and that wherever it is the law it is recognized as a beneficent safeguard against plutocratic power and corrupt political influence. This information which we gladly vouchsafe is easy of verification. Mr. Furuseth may learn on investigation that in Montana where a similar bill was presented to the Legislature in 1903 it was known as the "Fair-play Law" and was thus referred to in all the magazines of the country. The bill was passed in deference to popular clamor to which concrete articulation was given in a "monster" petition to the Legislature. Curiously enough the Montana law is objectionable for the reasons erroneously urged by Mr. Furuseth against the California bill. It permits the disqualification of four judges, four being the number suspected of responsiveness to the will of Millionaire Heinze. The necessity of disqualifying four judges in the interest of justice has never been manifest in this State, but occasionally we have seen one judge, despite protest and newspaper censure, hold onto a case in the interest of a public service corporation. Under our law at present a litigant may allege bias on the part of a judge in support of a petition for the removal of a case, but this law is farcical. The question of the judge's state of mind is left to the judge to determine. The average judge possessing a sense of decency will not try a case when informed that he is believed to be prejudiced, but there are notable instances of the atrophy of these senses on the bench. It is presumed that we are all entitled to have our legal rights determined by an impartial judge. Then why should any man be compelled to submit his case to a judge whom he knows to be prejudiced against him? Nearly one-half the cases that are tried in our courts are equity cases. For the trial of these cases no jury is impaneled. The judge passes on the law and the evidence, and if there is a conflict of testimony his judgment as to the evidence is final. What chance is there for justice in an equity case before an unfair judge? We have heard that judges have been suspected of prejudice against labor unions. Does Mr. Furuseth harbor such a suspicion?

More Objectionable Legislation

Another bill that has excited the distrust and evoked the censure of the mouthpieces of the Spreckels' oligarchy is the one which is designed to give the courts the power to review the acts of municipal commissions. This has been pronounced a most vicious piece of legislation. The principal objection to this bill, though it is not the one that has been advanced, is that our municipal commissions are now under the control of the sacrosanct oligarchy. In the opinion of our righteous rulers it would be sacrilegious to abate one jot or tittle of their authority. These somewhat inconsistent patriots in the same breath in which they pronounce it infamous to empower a litigant to disqualify a judge, characterize as outrageous the proposed bestowal of authority on the courts to check the licentiousness of political tools in public office. In one instance they affirm their unbounded faith in the impartiality of all judges; in the other they express their distrust of all courts. Under the proposed law which meets with their dis-approbation there can be no possibility of a recurrence of the French restaurant scandal, but this law might lead to a judicial investigation of the peculiar transactions by which the members of the Board of Public Works have brought themselves under suspicion. Is there dread of investigation in the Spreckels' oligarchy? If not why should our civic patriots be thrown into a spasm of indignation at the prospect of being regulated by a law which has been copied from the statutes of New York and which in that State has been found most beneficent in its operations?

Stemming the Christian Science Tide

Some of the pulpiteers of the jarring Christian sects are in a state of panic. The rapid diminution of their congregations has filled them with consternation. By some this phenomenon is attributed to the spread of Christian Science, and acting upon the theory that the infant sect is alienating affections from old if not outworn creeds efforts are being made to counteract the potent influence. Various are the methods that have been adopted to stem the tide of apostasy. Some clergymen have boldly attacked Christian Science as a fraud, and have sought to injure the reputation of the remarkable woman who founded the new religious institution, hoping by this method to destroy confidence in her teachings. Other clergymen of a more discreet nature have preferred to deal with Christian Science as a delusion. Among the discreet ones is the Rev. Bradford Leavitt of the First Unitarian Church, who lectured on Christian Science last Sunday. Mr. Leavitt is discreet in so far as he is temperate in his criticisms of a rival sect, but he is somewhat rash in venturing upon a discussion of something concerning which he is not well informed. We are not authorized to speak for Christian Science. We are not versed in its principles, but from what little we do know of them we are convinced that the Rev. Bradford Leavitt's acquaintance with them is so distant that he is, to say the least, imprudent in affecting an intimate familiarity. Apparently he assumes that the principle of the influence of the mind and the will over matter is the basis of Christian Science. Now as a matter of fact the basis of Christian Science is faith in God, which after all was the basis of original Christianity. Many of the teachings of Christian Science are in harmony with the traditional faith. It is through these teachings that many converts are made and in consequence of these teachings that many congregations that have grown weary of the speculations of advanced theologians have been diminished. Perhaps those pulpiters who are alarmed at the spread of Christian Science might find it far more to their advantage were they to hark back to the doctrines that emanated some centuries ago from the mouths of unlettered fisherman who asserted that not only is the spirit of man immortal, but the body also; that the latter is destined to resurrection similar to that of the Incarnate God, and both live forever with him in such felicity as the mind of man has never conceived. In the absence of faith in these fundamentals of Christianity we should suggest that the example of the Episcopal Church be followed in the endorsement of the Emmanuel Movement which does recognize the magic of will power rather than the potency of prayer.

Reforms In Funerals

Rev. A. R. W. Wyant, a Baptist minister, has been complaining of the lugubriousness of funerals. Which reminds us that funerals are much less funereal than they were not many years ago. A great change has taken place in our attitude toward the dead as toward most everything else. As in these days we smile and jest at sentiment and are expected to keep our sorrows to ourselves lest we bore our neighbors, the grief that is expressed at funerals and the signs of grief that accompany funerals are much less ostentations and impressive than formerly. Great changes have been wrought in all our manners and customs within a generation as we shall perceive if we but reflect. As for funerals they have been revolutionized as much as any of the social "functions." Accompanying the deceased to the cemetery on a railroad train is as great an innovation as indulging in conversation in the drawing-room after dinner. There was a time when men in polite society spent the hours after dinner under the table in the dining room, and in those days it would have been regarded as the height of vulgarity, not to say indecency, to ship the corpse by blind baggage to its last resting place. Furthermore in those days a private funeral would have been regarded with grave suspicion while the grades and gradations of "mourning," the amount of crape to be donned for each degree of kindred, the length of time in which crape should be worn, and the period in which jewels were barred, were all regulated by laws as rigid as those of the Medes and Persians. To have made the mistake of wearing a material which, though black as midnight, was not "mourning," or to have appeared at any function savoring ever so remotely of pleasure within a certain period was to court anathema. Little children had their mourning etiquette, and babies not yet steady on their feet were not exempted from black ribbons. Deaths of distant relatives in distant lands were mourned symbolically and many a poor family was plunged into debt to keep up appearances. Nowadays a band of black cloth hastily basted on the sleeve of the gayest garment is the only badge of mourning that a large majority affect, though it is but aping the conventional mourning into which English liveried servants are put when there is bereavement in the household of their masters; and black garments or not, no one remains away from any species of entertainment whatever unless it be during the days immediately preceding the sepulture. Reforms often come slowly and by imperceptible degrees. It is only when we pause and glance backward that the degree of progress is noticeable. These things are rarely brought about by concerted movements

Effects of Prohibition

The Prohibitionists have had things pretty much their own way of late, but now the accounts are coming in to be audited, and instead of unlimited prosperity due to the discouragement of crime we are beginning to hear of depression brought about through a shrinkage of markets. Liquor dealers and distillers are not the only victims of prohibitions. Farmers are suffering from a lack of purchasers for their grain, malsters are out of an occupation, coopers have less call than formerly for their wares, those who depended on the cooperage business for a market for their woodenware are feeling the pinch, glass blowers and cork cutters are out of a job and the transportation companies and all the handlers of various products are alike affected. At the same time the country, thanks to Teddy, is face to face with the largest treasury deficit it has ever known. Heretofore the distillers have been the chief source of revenue to the government, and the liquor consumers have paid a tax for the pleasure of indulging their habit, but luxuries being denied, the burden will now be placed upon necessaries. The farmer who cannot sell his corn will find a little added to the price of his tea and coffee, and the cooper and bottle-blower out of a job will find his next suit of clothes costing him a dollar or so more than his last. So far no reports have been received conclusive of the improvement of public morals. There are no signs that indicate the coming of the second redemption. Crime is still rampant and the heralds of the millenium have not yet put in an appearance.

The Half-Breed Pest

The case of Miss Helen Emory, who, with the consent of her mother, is determined to marry a Japanese domestic whom she persists in believing to be of great wealth and high lineage despite the contradiction of his mother and brother, is only another instance of "when a wilful woman will," and in all probability, as far as domestic peace and harmony are concerned, the marriage will not prove more disastrous than the majority in which eternal fitness is the last matter to receive attention. No doubt Miss Emory believes she will pine away and die if thwarted but in the course of a very few years she will probably be ready to apply for a divorce. The real tragedy of these mixed race marriages is not experienced by the principals. The sufferers are the children, who, as a rule, inherit the worst qualities of each parent and the best of neither. One of the most pathetic narratives of personal experience ever given to print appeared recently in one of the monthly magazines under the title "The Confessions of an Eurasian," the daughter of a Chinese mother and an English father, who found herself repudiated by both races. This is the common experience of the half-breed. One of the worst phases of the negro problem may be traced to blood mixture and the most serious outbreaks that have disturbed San Domingo had their origin among the half-breeds. The only unruly children in old Chinatown were those of a mixed parentage. The Eurasian is a pariah in India, and the toughest citizens that we have had on this coast were the cross-bred offspring of Indians and Spaniards, known as "greasers." Not for the fools that rush in where angels fear to tread should we be solicitous, but for the benefit of society we should do everything in our power to discourage such alliances as that which Mrs. Emory has so warmly endorsed.

Our Industrial Fads

Presumably any one who wants to get rich in a hurry in these days need but heed the importunities of the eucalyptus boomers. To the older generation there is something reminiscent in the song. Eucalyptus is enjoying its second advent, for, back in the seventies, when the tree was first introduced, we heard much the same tune. We had eucalyptus oil recommended as a remedy for every curable disease under the sun, while eucalyptus syrup would take care of the rest. Eucalyptus groves were the obvious preventives for malaria and eucalyptus products the banishers of malarial diseases. For shade trees they were unequaled, while for furniture, firewood and railroad ties they were unsurpassed. No doubt the eucalyptus possesses a fair share of all the vegetarian virtues, but enthusiasm for the cultivation of the tree was diverted. It failed to produce wealth, but it produced destruction in many cities where it was planted for the shade it afforded. It was found that in quest of moisture the eucalyptus will destroy sidewalks and sewers. Before this destructive tendency was discovered the eucalyptus had caused almost as much damage as the Belgian hare which was so zealously propagated some years ago by get-rich-quicksters. Many marvelous schemes have been exploited in this State under the delusion that peculiarly favorable conditions here existed. It was once believed that silk culture was to become one of the State's greatest industries. It was abandoned because it involved so much hand labor as to be impracticable where living wages must be paid. Ramie culture was another fad of short life. Farmers' wives were misled at another time into attempting the culture of licorice. Pulu, a curious sea island product which was to take the place of feathers, hair, cotton and all other mattress making materials, all but introduced bronchial epidemics before it was done away with. And now comes eucalyptus for a second inning.

Caminetti remained rebellious to the end and loudly shouted "no" while 37 Senators voted "aye." Despatch to the Examiner from Sacramento. Conspicuous as usual was the great tribune from Amador.

The First Easter Morn

(By Louis Alexander Robertson, the stricken poet whose friends recently gave an entertainment for his benefit by which they raised $900. Mr. Robertson has been bedridden for four years. He is suffering from an incurable disease—Editor's note)

Last at the Cross and first beside the tomb,
Three trembling women waited there to pay
To their dead Lord their sacred rites that day,
And sought their mournful vigil to resume;
But when they saw the early sun illume
The sepulchre the stone was rolled away.
Their hearts stood still with terror and dismay,
The grave was empty. Then the heavy gloom
Was lifted and a flood of glory shed
Its beams around them, and they heard a voice:—

"Why seek the living here among the dead?
Your Lord is risen." Their breaking hearts rejoice;
Grief melts in gladness, and with tear-dimmed eyes
They view the shining stranger with surprise.

Perspective Impressions

One of the most tragic of figures is the battered wreck of the social seas who has outlived her triumphs.

Now that we have the direct primary let us look forward with heaving midriff to the coming of the millennium.

"To Destroy a Government through the Ignorance of the Government" is the policy which the Hearst Syndicate has adopted under another name.

Mayor Taylor has been in office nearly two years, but it is doubtful whether he yet knows that the money has been stolen. When Phelan was Mayor he at least became conscious of the fact that hefting doth not avail against thieves that break in and loot. As for Schmitz he didn't give a damn. But isn't it possible to find a man for the job with the ability to protect the taxpayers of the city?

Is Livernash the only civic patriot who feels that he would like to change his name?

East street, which is in charge of the Harbor Commission, is the best paved street in the city. This is what we get for having a commission appointed by the "machine." But perhaps as soon as the direct primary gets into operation we shall be able to get some reformers on the job, men of the calibre of the members of our esteemed Board of Public Works, who will bring about uniformity in the matter of streets.

When it was falsely reported last week that Harriman's ill health necessitated his retirement from active business there was not a man in California that did not feel that the State was about to lose one of its best friends. Yet, less than two years ago our most beloved civic patriots were availing themselves of all the resources of ingenuity to procure his indictment by a packed grand jury.

Letters from a Juryman

One of Judge Lawlor's Prisoners at Discretion Now in Custody of the Sheriff Writes Again to Democritus This Time Complaining of the Arrogant Demeanor and Unprofessional Tactics of the Special Prosecutors.

Cell 1036, Hotel St. Francis.

My Friend Democritus:

Let me call you friend; although we have never met, and may not meet in this world until after the verdict in this Calhoun matter. You cannot understand how we jurybirds yearn for real human sympathy. We cannot be friends with each other, because we are so intimate —galley slaves are not friendly with their companions in misery. On the contrary, they hate each other with a mortal hatred, and what are we jurymen but galley-slaves of the law, as it has been inflicted by Judge Lawlor at his "discretion."

In my present "state of mind" I feel that I could disagree with every other jurybird in the cage. I am sure that the others feel as I do; and if we were called upon to render our verdict tomorrow it would be impossible to do so. Some of us would vote for acquittal and the others, in sheer hatred of each other, added to disgust of themselves for permitting the lawyers and the court to involve them in this predicament, would vote "guilty." This, I suppose, is the ordinary perversity of human nature.

I wish Judge Lawlor would tell us why we are compelled to sit in court during the examination of jurors. Is it his intention that we shall familiarize ourselves with every phase of the case before the actual evidence is presented for our consideration? He admonishes us to avoid discussion of the case with each other (which we are quite willing to do) and to refrain from reading the newspapers (which is a superfluous injunction as we are debarred from reading anything). But he compels us to hear the questions and arguments of counsel in examination of jurors, and to hear the answers and arguments of those who are thus questioned. No discussion among ourselves nor any reading of the newspapers could be more harmful in its influence upon our minds than these examinations which we are forced to endure from day to day.

Most of us came to the jury box absolutely ignorant of the details of the case and without opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused; some of us knew only what we had read in the headlines of the newspapers—which, as every reader of the newspapers is aware, is usually a mechanical condensation of misinformation biased to fit the policy of the newspaper. A more "receptive" bunch of jurybirds never went into the cage. Our "state of mind" was as "plastic" as beeswax. It was in condition to receive any and every impression. That impression is now being made by the lawyers and the court.

Why? Is it Judge Lawlor's intention that we shall make up our final "state of mind" before we hear the real evidence? It looks that way, doesn't it? I don't know what the others think of Mr. Heney and his method of presenting his case for our verdict, but for myself, I am getting into a "state of mind" that will not be favorable to the special prosecutor's purposes when it comes time to pass definitely on his view of this case. I am beginning to observe a vindictive spirit in Mr. Heney. He doesn't seem to be trying to arrive at the truth in this matter, but, on the contrary, he evinces, as I size him up, a disposition to browbeat and bullyrag everybody to his way of thinking. I was particularly impressed with his vicious assault upon Peter Duchien the other day. I didn't hear all of that examination for we were kept out of court during the greater part of the inquisition and only the vaguest rumors have thus far reached us as to what actually happened to Duchien. But we have learned enough to realize that in the case of this unfortunate man Heney has attempted to serve notice on all reputable citizens of San Francisco that unless they conform to his views they will be subjected to the treatment that he has inflicted on Duchien. I have even heard that the prosecutor has threatened to prosecute Duchien for perjury because he would not corroborate the "reports" of two Burns spies in relation to conversations which he had with these spies last July. If this isn't intimidation, I would like to know what Mr. Heney calls it.

Of course I do not know all the details of this Duchien affair, but from what I heard of his examination I am ready to believe anything. My "state of mind" is very "plastic" to any "impression" that may be made upon it by reports of Mr. Heney's efforts to win his case at any cost. I am becoming more and more convinced that he would not hesitate to employ the most expedient means of achieving his purposes; and I am also becoming more and more convinced that these purposes are of the most sinister character.

I have observed, too, while listening to these examinations of jurors, that Mr. Heney is not content with the establishment of grounds of challenge against a juror that has annoyed him by maintaining the opinion that the corporations of San Francisco were "held up" by Abraham Ruef, that wholesale immunity to the supervisors was granted for the purpose of obtaining cumulative evidence upon which to convict the "higher ups"; that Patrick Calhoun is entitled to the presumption of innocence until the prosecution shall produce direct evidence of his guilt beyond a moral certainty and a reasonable doubt; that the ex-supervisors who "confessed" to receiving bribes from Abraham Ruef through Jim Gallagher are as unworthy of credence in other matters, even under oath, as are any of Burns' spies; that such testimony is open to plausible suspicion of being dictated by those who gave the immunity; and that something more convincing than "circumstantial evidence" must be offered by the prosecution in this case—as was demanded by the juries that acquitted Tirey L. Ford.

It has been my observation in these examinations, I say, that Mr. Heney invariably pursues these jurors far beyond the point of challenge under the disqualifying sections of the code; that he continues to question them with insulting persistency long after they have clearly disqualified themselves; that he bullies, intimidates, browbeats and threatens those jurors, displaying not only malicious intention, but malignant and sinister purpose.

Speaking solely for myself, therefore, I say that I will never give a verdict to the cause that requires such methods for its maintenance. There is a limit to fair-dealing with a man like Heney actuated by motives such as I see developing in their outward expression. A fanatic may be enlisted in the most righteous cause that ever swayed the passions of mankind; but if his fanaticism goes to the extent of destroying everything that stands in the way of success for the cause, reaction against that cause is sure to ensue. The world hates a bigot. All anarchists are fanatics and bigots. Fanaticism is a species of insanity—the most dangerous insanity, for it runs amuck with all that opposes its purposes. Mr. Heney is a fanatic in that he would crush all opposition without regard for the consequences to all who stand in his way whether they are guilty or innocent; whether they are among the accused or only of those who object to the abuse of the law and the prostitution of justice in the desperate effort to ruin those who have incurred the hatred of Heney and his accomplices.

I thank you, Democritus, for sending my last letter, as published. The waiter was discreet, the napkin was ample, and the turnkey was not looking. I am writing this letter in the dark while my cellmate, whom I detest as heartily as he detests me, is snoring in his sleep. I will attach it to an American dollar and cast it out into the night, hoping that the finder will carry it to its address, taking the dollar as payment for his messenger service.

Yours in custody,

JURYBIRD.

The Cooper-Carmack Feud

How an Ex-United States Senator Met His Death in a Gubernatorial Contest in Tennessee in Which Personal Journalism Was a Deplorable Faction.

Not since the sensational murder for which Caleb Powers was three times convicted, twice sentenced to be hanged, and finally discharged, after years of imprisonment, because there was not, in human probability, any chance of ever deciding definitely and impartially who were the guilty parties, has the South experienced such a sensation as that incidental to the killing of Senator Carmack and the trial which has ended in the conviction of the two Coopers, father and son, for murder in the second degree. Like the Taylor affair the Carmack assassination was the climax of a protracted political feud in which the epithets hurled during the earlier stages were scarcely less stinging than the bullets which marked its close. A curious side issue of the case was the impanelment of perhaps the most illiterate jury ever selected in the United States, for, under the law of Tennessee any one who has read what purports to be evidence or has conversed with a witness, is disqualified, and as the testimony taken upon the application of the defendants to be admitted to bail was scattered broadcast throughout the State, only those who were unable to read at all were competent to serve.

The beginning of the quarrel dates back to more than two years ago, when the whisky element succeeded in preventing the re-election of Senator Carmack. In 1908 he entered the race as a candidate for the governorship. Prohibition was the issue, and Carmack came into the fight pledged to close every saloon and distillery in Tennessee. Governor Malcolm B. Patterson was his opponent, and by virtue of having already held the office for two years he had control of the party machinery. By promising as much as Carmack he was able to beat him at the primaries, but he then discovered that the machinery upon which he relied for election was in favor of a straight prohibition platform. Once secure of the nomination and election, Patterson had no desire to stand on a prohibition platform. His choice was local option, and by a manipulation of the cards he packed the State convention with a sufficient number of "safe" delegates to carry his platform through. Then Senator Carmack assumed the editorship of the Nashville Tennessean, a new paper which had espoused his cause, and he addressed himself to the subject of the machine being in control for another two years.

It was here that the Coopers come upon the scene, for Duncan Brown Cooper, the father, was Governor Patterson's chief adviser and Senator Carmack assumed the right to criticize him unsparingly. He confined himself, however, to ridicule and irony, a style of which he was master. The Senator had been editor-in-chief of the Nashville American in the eighties, when Col. Cooper was its proprietor. In the campaign Senator Carmack had referred to Cooper as "bald-headed angel Dunc." and inquired of his audiences if the "bald-headed angel Dunc Cooper was an angel of darkness or of light, or if there is not the smell of sulphur on his feathers." With the spirit of opposition, Senator Carmack held up to the public gaze the men of the Patterson administration, who were pledged to "cleanse" the State. The Legislature was forming and lines were tightening on the question of prohibition. An incident of the situation was the discovery that Gov. Patterson and ex-Gov. John I. Cox had made peace, and Duncan Brown Cooper was credited with being the agency which, as Carmack put it, "made the lion and the lamb lie down together." In the campaign of 1906 Patterson had denounced Cox as "a thief and a grafter and cheap John demagogue." Cooper had denounced Cox in similar language or had approved of publications making these charges. The coalition of Patterson and Cox was a significant political development in view of the fact that Cox had been elected to the State Senate. Senator Carmack made the most of this "coalition" in the news columns of the Tennesseean, and on Sunday morning, November 8, the Tennessean published an editorial from his pen on the subject which went into the history of the fight betwen Cox and Patterson and commented on the wonder that "oil and water" had been made to mix at last.

Now, according to the evidence which has been adduced in the trial, Edward B. Craig, formerly State Treasurer, visited Col. Cooper at the Hotel Tulane on the night of November 8th to try to collect at least a part of $2,000 which Cooper had got him to advance on salary warrants against the Louisville and Nashville Railroad for which Cooper had been a lobbyist. It appeared that as soon as Cooper had obtained this money he had quit the railroad and Nashville, and the Louisville and Nashville told Craig to whistle for his $2,000. Craig found Cooper too angry to discuss money. Craig testified that the Colonel was angry through and through. "Carmack was an ingrate and a scoundrel, and if he didn't stop using Col. Cooper's name in the Tennessean, the town will not be big enough for us both," and one or the other of them must die. Cooper insisted that he was a private citizen and not the subject of newspaper criticism in the light in which Senator Carmack chose to criticise him. Craig offered his good services in the matter, and with Cooper's consent crossed the street to see Senator Carmack. Craig returned to Cooper with the information that he could do nothing; that Senator Carmack reserved the right to print Cooper's name when occasion required.

Tapping his breast, Cooper said, "Then, by God, this note goes." Cooper swore in his story to the jury that when he said to Craig, "This town will not be big enough to hold us both," he meant that he intended to make public things which he knew about the personal and private life of Senator Carmack. He denied that he had meant that one or the other of them must die, and declared that Craig told him upon returning from the interview with the Senator that he had found him in an "ugly and vicious mood." He professed to have understood from Craig also that the name of Col. Cooper would not appear again in the Tessesseean. On the following morning, November 9th, the Tennesseean printed the famous "Diplomat of the Zweibund" editorial in which Senator Carmack called down "all honor and glory forever" on Col. Cooper for having "grafted" the dead bough to the living tree, "making it to burgeon and bring forth golden fruit."

Cooper was the "diplomat" and the "zweibund" was composed of Patterson and Cox. According to the evidence, 9 o'clock that morning found Col. Cooper at the office of his son Robin, armed and declaring that the end had been reached. Miss Daisy Lee, a stenographer in the employ of J. C. Bradford, Cooper's brother-in-law, and Robin Cooper, say he was back at the office again at 11 o'clock, storming and hurling anathema at Carmack. But the defense has denied this 11 o'clock visit strenuously. Miss Lee is mistaken. She did not hear Col. Cooper cursing and swearing, because Col. Cooper was not there. Before noon Senator Carmack received a message at the Tennesseean office that Col. Cooper intended to kill him on sight. This message was from Mrs. Lucius E. Burch, a daughter of Col. Cooper, who had telephoned it to a friend in an effort to locate her husband, Dr. Burch, and have him prevent trouble. The previous night Senator Carmack, answering the anxiety of friends over the message which Craig had carried from Cooper,

Gasparon's Revenge

(From the Spanish of Jacinto Picon)

When the bell sounded the recall of the factory hands from the luncheon hour Gasparon Santiagos, who was known to his fellows as Gaspar the Great on account of his great height and massive build, hastily tilted the last drops of stew and wine down his capacious throat. He was seated on the trunk of a tree with his wife, a pretty and graceful young woman, who met him every day at the lunch hour with a neat basket of food.

After lighting a cigarette he gave the babe in her arms a kiss, affectionately hugged his wife as a miser embraces his treasure-chest, and then started down the road to the factory.

Entering the gate he passed down a long row of crackling forges, through a net-work of iron levers, leather belts and flying wheels. He traversed half way a bridge beside which a colossal flywheel revolved at high speed, when he saw an apprentice running toward him so swiftly that he could not check his wild career before reaching the wheel. There was no time to go back, and perceiving that both could not pass the great wheel at the same time, Gasparon bent his huge bulk far outward over the rail, flattening himself as much as he could. The lad came on like a streak of lightning, turned badly as he violently collided with the big fellow, and fell face downward, barely remaining upon the single, wide, heavy timber that formed the floor of the bridge, hanging suspended over the oily abyss of the deep wheelpit, not daring to let go his hold and fall, unable long to remain where he lay. Gasparon, more fearful of the distant than of the nearer danger, stretched out his hand to the child, who, blinded by fear, snatched at it with such force and anxiety that the powerful workman was well-nigh overbalanced. As he lost his equilibrium, Gasparon instinctively threw out his free arm wildly as a counterpoise. His fingers came into sudden contact with something—he gripped a spoke of the whirling flywheel, and the mighty arm splintered just above the hand. The lad said afterward that to add to his terror, he heard it break with such a noise as one hears when the woodchopper's axe rives apart a splintered timber. But, even hurt as he was, the fellow retained his presence of mind well enough to step back coolly a pace or two, raise the frightened boy in his sound arm and carry him to safety to the shop floor before he collapsed, struck down silently by the severity of his pain.

There was shouting and running, and his comrades picked him up gently, taking him in a chair, since the factory boasted no infirmary, to the nearby hospital, where, later in the same afternoon, the surgeons took off the hopelessly maimed arm at the elbow.

Gasparon's convalescence was slow; in it disappeared first all his little savings, then the pawnbroker's loans upon his Sunday clothes, his cloak and his wife's mantle; after that a collection taken up for him by friends and charitable neighbors vanished speedily, and last of all a donation from the treasury of the Strikers' Aid Fund. There was no use thinking of any new sort of manual labor; for the arm he had lost was his right, and he had been right-handed.

Forty days or so after the accident his wife presented herself at the cashier's window at the factory office. It was a small room, divided by a wooden partition surmounted by a metal screenwork pierced here and there with small openings like windows, through which she could see a well-dressed old gentleman in a freshly laundered shirt reading a paper, seated close beside the cash drawer. About him, well within his vision, stood two men posting endless figures industriously in great books, over whose little pine pulpits they bent.

"What is it you want?" asked one of the clerks as she approached.

"How is Gasparon getting along?" queried the other

"Well! As if he could 'get along' at all—a one-handed man!"

"And you have come——?"

"To get his pay," she replied nervously.

One of the clerks opened a large book and began turning the leaves, mumbling "Gasparon—Gasparon."

"His name is Santiagos—boringmill gang, second section," volunteered the woman dully.

"Ah, yes; of course—Gasparon Santiagos! Here he is!"

"And he gets—" She sighed, and her eyes were troubled.

The clerk figured rapidly for a moment on a scrap of paper, and without looking up, asked: "Was he paid the week before?"

"Yes, sir."

"H'm—then there are—there must be——"

The old gentleman in the clean shirt dropped his paper and looked up, but not at the anxious woman.

"What day was it he hurt himself?" he demanded.

"The twentieth of last month—Wednesday, about two o'clock," she replied sadly.

"Then there is no trouble in finding out what is due the man," remarked the old gentleman suavely. "Monday, one; Tuesday, two; Wednesday—two days and a half, at four and a half the day, make eleven pesetas and twenty-five centimos: two dollars and a quarter altogether. Pay her, Luis." He shrugged his shoulders and picked up his paper.

The clerk took a small wicker basket full of silver from one of the drawers of the desk and counted out the pitiful sum, making the payment without a word. The young woman, mechanically taking what was proffered, went out, weeping softly. When the noise of her footsteps had died away, the cleanlooking old gentleman remarked severely:

"Don't forget that Gasparon is discharged! Make a note of it on your books."

When the workmen learned, as they speedily did, that Gasparon had been given only his bare two and one-half days' pay, their wrath boiled over and their indignation knew no bounds. Delegates were appointed quickly from the various shops and mills of the great works, and the little convention, meeting one night in the back room of The Frenchman Tavern to learn the full details of the case and take action thereon, the big fellow himself was cited to appear and state his facts.

Gasparon related his misfortunte with the greatest good nature, showed his fellows the cicatrized stump of his arm, scarred deeply, and afterward during the progress of the meeting seemed more interested in bothering his neighbors to roll cigarettes for him than in the business on hand. He had not yet been able to manage his cigarillos with only his left hand, and since comfort is a prime factor in life, he was deeply engrossed in his tobacco.

A smutty lamp which gave scarcely any light burned feebly overhead without illuminating the room. The smoke of cigars and cigarettes and the fumes of the cheap oil and wick filled the chamber with a stifling haze; it was almost impossible to see faces, while heads and bodies shaded off indistinguishably into the pungent gloom.

Our Night Life

The old down-town district which was once the center of gaiety is rapidly rounding into form, but it will not present anything approximating its old aspect, nor will it savor of its old familiar self until the cafes and theatres have again supplied their irresistible lure. The big stores have all blossomed out more colorful, more beautiful than ever, more consistent with metropolitan wealth and dignity, but these sumptuous establishments are of the shopping district and are animated only by day. By night their windows present gorgeous pictures of bewildering beauty dazzling and entrancing to feminine eyes, but while they contribute to the enchanting ensemble of the nocturne they can add nothing to the mirth of the scene which they adorn. Without the cafes and the theatres the night in the old heart of this great city is a dreary waste, but these indispensable elements will soon be pulsating with the old atmosphere. Next month will see the opening of the Orpheum at the old stand, in a big, brand new steel building. This will probably be one of the gayest events in the young life of the new city. I believe that nearly all the seats for the opening performance have already been sold.

The Cafes Are Coming

So far the Bismarck in the Pacific Building is the only big cafe in motion but across the way from the Orpheum, on the site of Fisher's old theatre, the hammers are ringing and work is being rushed on the cafe that "Jack" Tait expects to open before the summer is far advanced. Down under the Flood Building artisans are putting the old Fiesta Cafe in trim for "Jack" Thompson and Leader Jaulus. The place has been remodeled and will be more beautiful than ever. The feature of this cafe is to be a large orchestra which will give high class concerts every evening. It will be opened next month. Across the way on the site of St. Ann's Building, the Techau Cafe Company has put up a brick building and Mine Host Morrison expects to have his glad hand in working order in the month of May. This cafe will be opened with a sensation in the person of Rigo, the Gypsy fiddler, who made himself an object of interest to women all over the world by alienating the affections of the Princess Chimay, who was formerly Clara Ward of Detroit. Rigo may be depended upon to hold 'em awhile.

A Pleasing Prospect

So it is evident that the goddess of pleasure will soon have her shrines as of old, and as for worshipers they will come trooping to the altars. A mint of money is being spent to provide diversion and entertainment for the growing populace, and the men who are engaged in the business of catering to the merriment of the community and promoting the joy of living are looking forward to a very prosperous season. With Portola day in the foreground and the glad prospect of a large supply of facilities for inducing the joyous mood, the probability is that the carnival spirit will soon have such a firm hold on the community that we shall quit making faces at one another and mend our parochial ways.

"Mama, who was Minerva?"

Praise From Mrs. Atherton

That brilliant woman, Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, has been wielding her facile pen in defense of our Ambassador to France, Mr. Henry White, who was recently pronounced a snob by a writer in the Hearst papers. Mrs. Atherton denies that Mr. White is a snob and suggests that those persons who have received an unfavorable impression of him are perhaps themselves vulgar upstarts who demanded of him favors to which they were not entitled, and who were aggrieved at being denied. According to Mrs. Atherton our ambassador to France is "the American diplomatist of whom we have the greatest reason to be proud; and not only for his incomparable manners, but for his warm and genuine Americanism that no amount of old world polish could hide if it would." I hope that Mrs. Atherton's description of Mr. White is accurate. Assuming that it is accurate one must also assume that Mr. White did not write a certain letter which was recently attributed to him by the Hearst papers. I allude to the letter which is said to have been received by Mr. W. H. Taft when he was matists thoroughly, she should not have the robustest applied to Mr. White, who was then in a clerical position in an American embassy, for an invitation to a court function, and he received, it is said, the letter in question, informing him that invitations were available only for persons of distinction, or words to that effect. Of course, it was unnecessary for Mr. White to tell Mr. Taft that he was not of sufficient importance to be favored with an invitation. Even a man of little importance may have sensibilities as tender as those of a man of distiction. It is hardly conceivable that a man fitting the description which Mrs. Atherton has given us of Mr. White would write so tactless a letter as that which was printed in the Hearst papers and attributed to Ambassador White. Of course Mrs. Atherton may have had opportunities of observing only the better instincts of our diplomatist. Plato has observed that a physician if he would obtain a real insight into the nature of disease should not himself be a man of robust health. In the same way, would Mrs. Atherton understand our diplomatists thoroughly she should not have the robustest social prestige. Mrs. Atherton is a woman of distinction and men of distinction are on their best behavior in her presence. I have no doubt that she believes Mr. Phelan's instincts to be as fine as Mr. White's.

The Self-Revelations of Yellow Journalism

In justice to Mrs. Atherton it should be said that her testimony is not to be conclusively gainsaid by documentary evidence furnished by the Hearst syndicate notwithstanding its high standing as a purveyor of private correspondence. It would not astonish me to learn that the letter purporting to have been written by White was fabricated for the purposes of an ingenious writer to whom had been assigned the task of defaming the ambassador. A feat of this character is not beyond the scruples of the up-to-date yellow journalist; nor is fear of exposure a powerful deterrent. Nowadays yellow journalism seems to exult in self revelation. The other day I pointed out that a woman who was pictured on one page as upholding a proposition was represented on the second page as expressing a contrary sentiment. This sort of thing is becoming habitual and in the Examiner of Thursday, March 18th, it was asserted in the headlines of an article falsely attributing to Mr. Harriman the intention of retiring from business that he had said that "Roosevelt was not to blame for panic." Midway in the column Mr. Harriman was quoted as follows: "The panic would not have resulted if Roosevelt had not carried on his prosecution of the cases against the railroads with such vigorousness." Thus we see that our yellow journalists are not only fearless of exposure but that they actually expose themselves.

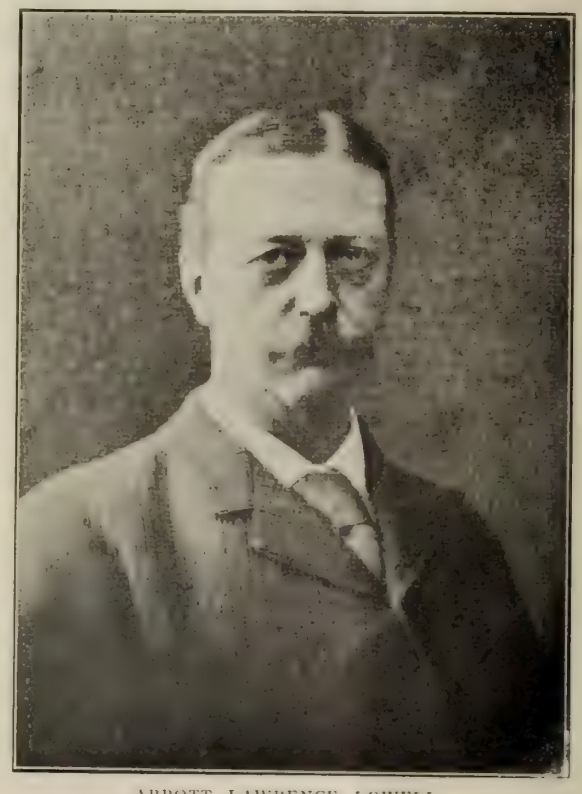
The Snob Journalistic



Coming back again to Mrs. Atherton, she aroused considerable curiosity by her vague allusion to the journalistic snob who is a climber in New York society and who, "even in a business conversation cannot refrain from mentioning the names of certain famous leaders, hinting that they are his intimate friends." Is this an allusion to Mr. Arthur Brisbane, the distinguished Socialist-Democrat who is paid an enormous salary to stir up class hatred? It is known that Mr. Brisbane hobnobs with the Clarence Mackays and other representatives of the New York smart set. But there is also on the Hearst staff Mr. Alfred Henry Lewis, author of a book called "Woolfskin Stories" or "Wolfville Stories." He was once angeled in a weekly newspaper enterprise by Mr. "Ollie" Belmont, and he can boast of his social connections if so inclined. It was Mr. Lewis, I believe, who told the Taft-White story, but it is Mr. Brisbane who hammers White editorially. It does not follow, however, that either Brisbane or Lewis is sore on White. The animus of the knocks may be emanating from the same source from which both gentlemen are inspired when they attack Mr. Root.

Editor and Correspondent at Variance

Speaking of Mr. Lewis I am reminded that shortly after he was sent to Washington to boost Mr. Hearst's latter-day friend Mr. Roosevelt, he wrote that all criticisms of the Panama Canal were inspired with ulterior motives, and after the manner of our leading reformers and of the leading reformers in all ages he asserted, by way of intimidating and silencing critics, that hereafter everybody would be justified in assuming that anybody who found fault with the principles of construction was the tool of the railroads. A few weeks later there appeared in print a Hearst syndicate editorial deriding the lock system and affirming that a sea level canal was the only kind worth having. Which inclines me to the opinion that Mr. Lewis ought to be called back to New York to get in touch with the editorial policy.

His Daughter Hooks a Title

Notwithstanding the powerful hostility of Mr. Hearst's ablest writers to Mr. Henry White, that gentleman is very likely to remain the American Ambassador to France. With the possible exception of General Porter this country has never been represented in Paris by a more popular or a more generous host than Mr. White, and after all the only triumphs of an envoy that are worthy of consideration when nations are at peace are of a social nature. The art of diplomacy is the science of gladhanding. There was a time when the official representatives of the United States in foreign countries were expected to behave with democratic simplicity. That was when the people of this country conceived that it was their appointed mission on earth to educate the benighted citizens of other nations out of their blind allegiance to a monarchical form of government. But we have emerged from that halcyon delusion. As a World Power ridiculously proud of our commercial supremacy and absurdly given to vulgar ostentation both in private and public life, it pleases us immensely to dazzle the effete aristocracy of the old world with evidences of our extraordinary prosperity. So nowadays we are represented abroad by men who are able to give splendiferous entertainments. It is at dinner between the soup and the nuts and during the postprandial feast of reason that a better understanding is promoted, a more genuine sympathy developed between the people of two countries. Now it is a fact that Mr. White has been feeding the French unremittingly and incidentally paralyzing them with the magnificence of his functions. His success has been attested in a measure by the circumstance that his daughter, Miss Muriel White, has captured a title. The Ambassador gave a dinner to the nobility the other day for the purpose of having his daughter's engagement to Count Seherr-Thoss announced. The Count was formerly in Emperor William's bodyguard and he is said to be a good fellow. His father is a member of the Prussian House of Lords, and his uncle has charge of the royal palace at Liegnitz. He has a royal pull which may not be entirely ignored if exerted in behalf of his prospective father-in-law at the seat of our democratic government.

How About the Ethics of This Case?

As Dean of the Hastings College of Law, the versatile Edward Robeson Taylor, hewer of moral platitudes and drawer of several salaries, frequently takes occasion to impress upon the students who sit at his feet and absorb wisdom the importance of intellectual honesty. He has told them that it involves high moral integrity and that it is the leading characteristic of every great lawyer. Inferentially it is a leading characteristic of Mayor Taylor. How then are we to account for the conduct of Mayor Taylor with reference to the Election Commission? The Supreme Court recently decided that Mayor Taylor erred in failing to appoint to that commission two representatives of the Independence League. Thereupon Mayor Taylor appointed two representatives of that organization, but he did not declare vacant the positions of the men whom he had illegally appointed. Consequently the men appointed in accordance with law must bring suit to oust the men who are holding office contrary to law. Mayor Taylor may see fit to explain that he knows of no ground upon which to remove the commissioners in office. This explanation will not satisfy me. Mayor Taylor demonstrated in the case of School Director Boyle that there is nothing so easy as to find a plausible reason for dispensing with the services of an undesirable member of his official family. Mayor Taylor appears to be quite as felicitous in ignoring the provisions of the charter which he helped to frame as was that other shifty Executive, Mr. James D. Phelan, who, it was popularly supposed, had consecrated himself to the upholding of that instrument. So high-minded a man as Mayor Taylor should scorn to do Phelan politics, but the violation of the charter by Mayor Taylor is but a venial offense compared with Dean Taylor's toleration of the indecent evasion of the plain letter of a decision of the Supreme Court.

"I hear, doctor, that you treated Jones for liver trouble and that he died of stomach trouble."

"That's an infamous slander. When I treat a man for liver trouble, sir, he dies from liver trouble. Understand?"

Bearding an Ambassador

Frederick A. Brandt, one of the rising stars in the Examiner firmament, seems inclined to blaze with a too solemn splendor, threatening to absorb the combined radiance of all the lesser lights whose scintillant beams have so long illumined the dark and devious path of Examiner readers. Mr. Brandt was sent to interview James Bryce, described as a "scholar among British ambassadors and ambassador among British scholars." It is needless to say that the interview was futile as far as substantial "scholarly" or "ambassadorial" results were concerned; but the newspaperman managed to write a column-and-a-half on what Mr. Bryce refused to say and why he refused. It was a masterly ado about nothing. I was particularly impressed with Mr. Brandt's adaptation of vocabulary and diction to his subject. It was all in the big bow-wow as befitted the magnitude of the Personage. Mr. Bryce had declined to be interviewed for an "exclusive story," because he had made it a rule never to give out anything of interest to the American public "without discrimination." He would talk to all the reporters, but he would not permit himself to be exploited as a monopoly. Whereupon Mr. Brandt remarked with becoming gravity: "But you surely must appreciate the equation of individual newspaper initiative." Mr. Bryce must have guessed the meaning of this remarkable sentence for he is reported by Mr. Brandt to have answered: "I do not think that has anything to do with the position I assume. The individual interview, I repeat, is unfair." Courtesy is one of the requirements of the trade of diplomacy. Even if this eminent statesman had not grasped the meaning of Mr. Brandt's top-lofty language he would have made believe that he did.

British Comment on Bryce

According to British journalistic opinion Mr. Bryce obtained the British Embassy at Washington on the strength of his book "The American Commonwealth." At the time of his appointment the London Saturday Review said: "It is no doubt conceivable that Mr. Bryce would have been appointed to Washington if he had not written that book, but we should say it is very improbable." And the great British weekly added: "No other reason for his appointment occurs to us spontaneously, though one might perhaps discover or invent other reasons if one tried." And again: "We had not understood that the Prime Minister regarded Mr. Bryce as so disastrous a failure in Ireland as to be anxious to take the first opportunity to move him without friction." The Review characterizes our distinguished visitor as "a dry and bookish Scot" who was not at home in Irish atmosphere when he was filling the post of Chief Secretary. "We cannot find it very easy," says the uncomplimentary British journal, "to imagine the Irish nation with its peculiar genius of brilliancy and charm, inconsolable at Mr. Bryce's departure. No doubt for political ends anybody can be made welcome; but even if Mr. Bryce appealed to the Irish head, he can hardly have thrilled the Irish heart. If there were other good reasons for sending Mr. Bryce to America, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman may well have felt that the reasons for keeping him in Ireland were not absolutely imperative."

His Loyalty Challenged

Though the Review does not regard Mr. Bryce as a great statesman it is admitted by that cultured journal that his "American Commonwealth" is a pretty good book. Nevertheless it asserts that aside from the authorship of the book no other evidence of his fitness for the Washington post can be conceived. "Americans," says the Review, "might safely be expected to receive with open arms an Englishman, a Scotchman to be exact, who has recorded with enthusiasm his conviction that the United States have a far greater and a more brilliant future to look forward to than the British Empire." In the opinion of the Review there is danger of Mr. Bryce being more loyal to America than to England, since it is evident from his book that he has a passionate bias towards everything American." It is a question," says the Review," whether Mr. Bryce will not represent America when his business is to represent England." There was really great alarm and many misgivings in the Review office when Mr. Bryce was appointed. "Should there be an opportunity," said that patriotic journal, "we may look for more Alaskan surrenders. Americans will be able to build their canals and revise their copyright with as little respect for British interests as before. It is safe to snub the British lion has long been a maxim of American diplomacy. Mr. Bryce may be trusted to convert it into an axiom."

Greenway and Phelan

James D. Phelan and Ned Greenway are at variance upon a question of veracity. It was testified in the Calhoun case by Herbert S. Bonifield, and it stands forever in the record of the court, that Greenway told the witness that he had refused to withhold invitations to the Friday Night Assemblies from the Calhouns and Thornwell Mullally as requested by James D. Phelan, and further, in explanation of his refusal, that Greenway had told Phelan that some people were better born than others and therefore better entitled to receive invitations for assemblies of this kind than some of those who managed to force themselves upon the company of ladies and gentlemen. James D. Phelan, in a letter to the Bulletin, the "lease" of which has not yet again "expired," denies the statement of Greenway, saying that while he had a right to ask for the alleged favor at the hands of the social arbiter, being himself a "patron" of the Assemblies, still he did not do so. Thus is the issue joined between James D. Phelan and Ned Greenway; and we must now decide whose word is most worthy of credence. Let me subject the issue to inductive process of analysis. It ought to be easy to determine a question of this scope, where the protagonists are so conspicuous in the public eye and whose activities are so constantly recorded in the public prints.

His Affidavit of Expense

First let me consider the reputation of Greenway for truth and veracity. Has any one ever heard that he was a liar? Has any one ever accused him of perverting facts to serve his selfish purposes? Has any one ever known him to speak evil of his neighbor; to slander his fellow citizens; to conspire against the good name of those whom he might be pleased to dislike; to plot injury against those who might stand in the way of his ambitions, his desires, his interests? The answer is loudly and unanimously in the negative. But how about the reputation of James D. Phelan in this regard? Is the answer either loud or unanimous? Take for example Mr. Phelan's affidavits of expense incurred by him in two campaigns for the office of Mayor of San Francisco. These affidavits were required by law as a guarantee that the candidate had not spent more than ten per cent of the salary of the office to which he aspired, in the effort to gain the office. It is notorious that between $15,000 and $25,000 was spent in the interest of Mr. Phelan in each of these mayoralty campaigns. Did Mr. Phelan spend the money? Was it Phelan money or the money of somebody else? Did Mr. Phelan swear to the truth in his affidavits? If the money was spent; if it was Mr. Phelan's money; and if the affidavit was false, how does the oath of Mr. Phelan stack up against the word of Ned Greenway?

ised that he would not oppose the enterprise. The Supervisors passed an ordinance granting permission for the maintenance of the track. The newspapers protested. Mr. Phelan, always sensitive to any expression of what seems to be public opinion, hedged upon his agreement with Poniatowsk.y On the last day of the term allowed for the Mayor to disapprove the measure, at midnight of that day, Mayor Phelan went to the rooms of the Board of Supervisors and vetoed the ordinance. The veto is on record in the archives of the Board and is part of the history of San Francisco. The promise that James D. Phelan made to Prince Poniatowski is corroborated by the testimony of enough reputable citizens to satisfy any disinterested court in Christendom. Now how does it stand between James D. Phelan and Prince Poniatowsky upon the issue of veracity?

A "Shifty" Witness

James D. Phelan testified in a matter involving municipal interests of San Francisco, while he was Mayor of the city. The case is on record before the Supreme Court. It doesn't matter at this time what it was all about. Suffice it to say in this connection that after Phelan had testified Chief Justice Beatty handed down a decision entirely apart from his opinion as to the merits of the case at bar, in which he gave it as his opinion that James D. Phelan was "the shiftiest witness" he had ever heard. The opinion was not a part of the judicial record; it was only the personal opinion of Chief Justice Beatty; but it is sufficiently convincing for those who know Chief Justice Beatty and are also acquainted with James D. Phelan.

Summing up the Evidence

Other instances wherein the word and oath of James D. Phelan have been at variance with the record, the fact and his own agreement might be cited; but I think these are sufficient to impeach the veracity of Mr. Phelan in any controversy with Ned Greenway. False in one, false in all, is an ancient axiom of the law; and I think it holds firmly is this issue of personal veracity between the arbiter of social elegancies and the arbiter of the graft prosecution.

Wife (severely to husband)—My dear, you have had enough wine.

A Lady-like Boycott

I am surprised to hear that the women of the Ladies' League of Justice have placed a boycott on all the newspapers that are willing to accord to Patrick Calhoun his legal privilege of presumption of innocence until the prosecution shall prove him guilty. I am told that these women, most of whom are members of the women's clubs of San Francisco, have issued orders to all the women's clubs in the city not to furnish these newspapers with any news relating to the clubs of which they are members. I am not surprised at the action of the Lady Leaguers, but I wonder at the little wit of the proceeding. I am almost inclined to the belief that it was advised by Professor Boke, so lacking is it in every essential of good policy. Bigotry and fanaticism of this sort will not help the cause of the prosecution, and if Mr. Heney does not wish to see every woman's club in San Francisco arrayed against him he will try to curb the pernicious activity of his "Knitters." The women of these clubs have minds of their own and they are resenting this attempt at dictation over their affairs by those of their members who belong to the Ladies' League of Justice. It is a small matter, of course, and those who have been commanded to boycott the anti-graft prosecution press are paying not the slightest heed to the ukase of the Ladies' League; but it is interesting as an example of the smallmindedness of the superfluous adjuncts of the prosecution. It merely goes to show to what desperate straits the prosecution is driven when it lends its approval to such trifling efforts on its behalf in the attempt to influence public opinion in its favor. It is in consonance with the "state of mind" of the talesman recently examined as to his qualifications to serve as a juror in the Calhoun case, who told the court that instead of allowing the defendant his legal presumption of innocence and requiring the prosecution to prove their charges against him, he would require the defendant to prove his innocence. This bigot happens to be a citizen of a civilized nation, but he belongs to the dark ages; he was born about 500 years too late; he is an anachronism, like the Ladies' League of Justice.

Patent Medicine for Female Livers

If you want to be a lady of the League of Justice you must "realize the serious condition of public affairs in this city"; you must "fear the degradation of the city in the eyes of the world"; you must not acquiesce in any permanent miscarriage of justice," through the effects of "a low and torpid state of the public conscience"; and you must "deliberately express your condemnation of every act calculated to impede the course of the law in the trial of the graft cases"—in short you must assist to the limit of your ability the "courts and officers of the law now engaged" in the trial of persons whom Rudolph Spreckels and James D. Phelan and their followers have accused. When you have done all this you will do your part towards "establishing justice in our midst." The quoted sections are excerpts from the pledge of the Female Branch of the Citizens' League of Justice. Omitting the specific designations of the purpose of the pledge and substituting the word "liver," and you pledge yourselves to swallow none but Dr. Beacham's pills or, if another famous "remedy" is written into the pledge you subscribe to your faith in the "friendship" of Lydia Pinkham. Every female whose liver is in a "low and torpid state" must "realize the serious condition" of her internal "affairs." What patent medicines will "establish justice in our midst,"—that is to say, perfect health "in our midst,"—more readily or permanently than the pills aforesaid and the "remedies" concocted and distributed by the sainted Lydia?

Utilizing the Tempestuous Petticoat

If there is anything more ridiculous, more absurd, or more grotesque, "in our midst," than this Female League of Justice, it is probably Professor Boke in the act of reversing a decision of the Appellate or Supreme Court; and that is saying much, for Professor Boke is not only ridiculous in himself but absurd in action. Most of the members of the Female League are grandmothers who have been denied the privilege of age in dictation of the policies of the various "clubs" to which they have belonged. Their daughters and their daughters-in-law have probably objected to grandma's methods of rearing "the children of the third generation." So that there is but one "sphere of activity" for the ancient dames," namely, the regulation and "establishment of justice in our midst." Isn't it funny to hear them speak of things "in our midst?" And isn't it funny to hear them prating of the "low and torpid state of the public conscience" and "any permanent miscarriage of justice?" Yet Rudolph Spreckels and James D. Phelan are not ashamed to use these poor old women to subserve their selfish and vindictive purposes. Through these women they hope to influence some of the business men of San Francisco in support of the graft prosecution by threat of boycott upon them in the traffic that deals in feminine gear. That is really the only use of the Female League to the graft prosecution. It is a base and cowardly use, and it will be condemned by every good citizen. There are men enough in San Francisco to engage in this sordid, miserable strife without inviting the women to take part in it. And the cause that enlists women for its support is desperate indeed. We can find ample excuse in the character of the women themselves for accepting the "knitters" under the guillotine of the French Revolution as appropriate actors in that terrific tragedy; and we do not wholly condemn the "suffragettes" of England, because they are battling in a cause personal to their own interests. But when women in our own city organize to "establish justice in our midst," we are constrained to contribute from our own cheeks the blush that may never flame upon the countenance of a female of the Citizens' League of Justice.

A Visitor From Queensland

Perhaps the most distinguished "stranger within our gates" last week was Mr. Theodore Unmack of Brisbane, Queensland, Australia. Mr. Unmack has been actively connected with government affairs in his own country; having been formerly Postmaster General, and now a member of Parliament. He is also a member of the Board of Health and of the Chamber of Commerce. For some time he has been traveling about the world and making observations, and during his stay in San Francisco he has been a keen student of civic affairs. Mr. Unmack was a guest at the luncheon of the Reception Committee of the California Promotion Committee when the members of the Board of State Harbor Commissioners were present, and in response to an invitation to speak he expressed his interest in what he had heard of their plans to improve and increase the facilities of this port. He was at home on the subject of municipal government as conducted in Australia, and while outlining the policies and methods of administration in his own country he took occasion to make some suggestive comparisons with the American system, and he expressed a conviction that American municipalities would profit by a study of conditions in the southern continent. One point which particularly impressed Mr. Unmack was California hospitality, and he expressed his gratitude to the Reception Committee for its courtesy, not only in inviting him to the luncheon but for supplying him with information about the city and State. Not to be outdone in gracious good-fellowship, the Australian statesman issued a standing, sweeping invitation to all present to give him the honor of returning the compliment, should any of them find occasion to visit Queensland. Mr. Unmack has enlisted as a voluntary missionary, and has promised to tell the people through his home press of the advances made by San Francisco within the past few years as well as of the beauties and attractions of the region about the bay.

The Pebble Beach Club House

The molds for the concrete foundations of the new club house which is being erected at Pebble Beach on the famous 17-mile drive, are now in place and the work of completing this part of the house will be rushed as fast as possible. In the meantime a saw mill has been established back in the forest and the work of getting out the lumber for the new building is going on rapidly. When completed this club house will be unique among buildings of its kind in the world. In addition to the many features of the club house itself—it has a situation which is absolutely unapproachable. It sits on a knoll facing the beautiful Pescadero Bay and the Pebble Beach. Immediately opposite it across the bay the massive bulk of Point Lobos is seen. It is the intention of the Pacific Improvement Company to make the new club house a nucleus for the many villas and homes which will be built in this charming locality as soon as it is opened up. The new roads which are being constructed through the forest as an extension to the 17-mile drive offer to the home builder some of the most picturesquely beautiful sites in the world.

SUCCESS OF BISMARCK CAFE A TRIBUTE TO THE PROPRIETORS

That San Franciscans thoroughly appreciate excellent cafe service, and know how to express their appreciation by constant and increasing patronage, is amply attested to by the phenomenal success that has been scored by the Bismarck Cafe, under the Pacific Building, during the brief period that it has been catering to the public. Opened just a year ago, at a time when the proprietors of all the large cafes feared to essay the downtown section, the Bismarck, commodious as it was, nevertheless scored an instant hit—its success being one of the main factors that finally convinced the merchants along Van Ness avenue and Fillmore street that the trade center was one again being restored to the burned district. The success achieved by the Bismarck is primarily due to the sagacity and broad experience in the restaurant business of its proprietors, Fritz Muller and his sons, Otto, Charles and Fritz, Jr. To the pleasing personalities of all of the Mullers, and particularly to that of Otto, who personally takes charge of the dining-room, is due the fact that old customers are never lost, while new ones are constantly being made.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Since last week's letter more confidence has been shown in Stock Market Securities. There has evidently been good buying of Southern Pacific common around 118½. The action of the general market indicates that pool operators are sharpening their knives making ready for active operations. The tariff readjustment has had its effect, and will cease to be a material factor in the slashing of values. The small shorts who run at a shadow succeed in advancing prices more than ordinary in order to get into the clear. What will happen when the big fellows start to take the water pumps? It will be most interesting. I am told Illinois Central will receive a very substantial advance in the near future. New York Central and Pennsylvania have been given excellent support of late and will advance sharply when matters shape themselves. Canadian Pacific has been depressed on war rumors. St. Paul has shown an undercurrent of strength of late. It is reported that the Rogers crowd have been good buyers of this stock under 145. Renewed interest is being shown in Western Pacific securities. I am informed by reliable authority that not more than 95,000 shares of the company's stock is out; the rest is held by the Denver Rio Grande and George Gould. Those closely identified with the company will sooner or later absorb the small amount of stock afloat after which prices will seek a much higher level. The passing of the Colorado Southern Ry. into the Burlington System adds materially to the Western Pacific prospects. The 18,000 miles of Gould and 12,000 miles of Hill's lines will prove big feeders to the Western Pacific. It is not likely Hill will throw any business to the Harriman lines that he can reach over the Western Pacific. I still believe Western Pacific stock will sell at 50 before January 1st and would not be surprised to see it sell at 75 by that time. Looking at the stock market from all angles. I believe we are nearing the starting of a big advance.

Local securities are firm and indicate improvements. United Ry. 4 per cent bonds are the cheapest and most attractive security on the market and will go on a soaring tour soon. Eastern investors are giving them more than ordinary attention of late. In order to get local interest in them it will be necessary for the East to buy them and advance the price when local investors will awaken to their true worth and buy them back from early buyers at material advanced price. Telephone common shook up the dry bones by advancing $10 on what is asked. The advance speaks for itself. There are other "sleepers" that will soon take a hand in the upward march.

Grain

Trade in the May option has not been as active this week as last and prices have held within a range of about 3 cents. The news has been mostly in favor of the bears although they were not inclined to take an aggressive stand and on signs of the leading bull interest supporting the market they were quick to cover and with the outside interest inclined to let the big fellows fight it out amongst themselves has put the market in a waiting mood. Receipts the past week have been more liberal and stocks which have been decreasing at all market points are now showing slight increase which is due to the high prices being paid for all grades of wheat and most favorable weather for marketing. The cash demand is not at all urgent but fancy prices are still being paid for the better grades of soft wheat. Export business has failed to materialize as yet although it is confidently expected to pick up before long judging by reports from the large importing countries. The July option is now the center of attraction and while prices have declined slightly during the past week it has been due mostly to local bearish sentiment rather than to any important change in conditions of the growing crop. While it is yet a little early to judge the condition of the new crop the warm weather is showing the effects of the severe winter, and there are numerous complaints coming from different sections of the winter wheat belt telling of wheat being so thin on the ground that it is being plowed under and the acreage put in oats. From Texas also comes reports of Hessian fly damage to wheat. While these reports have had but little effect so far it is only a question of time when the trade will wake up to an already bullish situation. The July option will then be put on a higher level.

Cotton

A few weeks ago I predicted through these columns, that in view of the many problems just ahead it would not be long before the cotton market began to show signs of increasing activity. The accuracy of this prediction has been fully demonstrated by the action the market has displayed the past week. July cotton after selling around 9.60 the first of the week declined to 9.15 on Thursday as a result of the drastic liquidation brought out under hammering tactics by brokers said to act for Theodore H. Price, one of the shrewdest market manipulators ever known in the history of cotton. The return of Mr. Price to the cotton market at this time need surprise no one; and if he intends to champion the cause of cotton this year as he has done in many previous years, no more opportune moment could have been selected to drive out the weak long interests and place the market in an over-sold condition, which is the usual procedure just before the launching of a real bull campaign. In fact this work seems to have been so well carried out in anticipation of the publication on March 20th of the final Ginners Report by the United States Census Bureau, that slight covering by room traders at the opening on Friday morning advanced the market 8 to 10 points within three minutes, and when the Government figures were finally made known Saturday morning at the opening, the market showed an advancing tendency on figures that on their face looked decidedly bearish.

The report shows 13,408,000 bales to have been ginned for the season of which 344,000 bales are linters or non-spinable against 11,325,000 last year and 13,305,000 year before last.

Social Prattle

Putting Up a Social Front

It may be true as an average proposition that half the world does not know how the other half lives, but most of those who live in fashionable hotels know how the other half lives, but this knowledge extends to the minutest details of domestic economy and financial resource. One of the several prominent hotels in San Francisco is largely inhabited by this "other half" sort of folk, whose income is so meager that they can only afford the price of the room they occupy. This, however, is sufficient for the purpose of those who live this life. By an expenditure of $50 or $60 a month for room rent, they are privileged to inscribe the name of the hotel on their visiting cards, to write their notes and letters on the hotel stationery, and to receive their friends in the hotel parlors and corridors—"it is so much pleasanter, you know, to sit here in the crowd but not of it, than to stay in your apartments however elegant they may be." As a matter of truth, these pretenders and social hypocrites occupy "inside rooms," which they rented when there was a demand for tenants so far exceeding the supply that "no reasonable offer was refused." Now the "roomers" enjoy the prestige conferred by residence in a first-class hotel, gained by wise foresight and long experience in the art of living up to their social pretense, on absolutely nothing to speak of.

BESSIE—LOUISE DICHMAN

Daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Dichman, whose engagement to Thurman Harrison Bane, U. S. A., Lieutenant of the 14th Cavalry, and son of the Rev. and Mrs. A. C. Bane of this city, has been announced. Miss Dichman, although still a very young girl, has seen much of the world, for she has traveled extensively. She was educated in New York and abroad, speaks several modern languages fluently, and has a rich contralto voice which has been well cultivated. In fact, she had intended to take up singing professionally, and arrangements were about perfected for a fashionable concert to take place this very month at the residence of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, at which she was to have made her debut. Friends were predicting a brilliant career for her, but all that is changed now, and instead of the applause of the multitude the wedding bells will ring before the end of the summer. Miss Dichman's fiancee was a lieutenant-commander in the navy from which he resigned to become American Minister to Bogota. Lieutenant Bane is a graduate of the Military Academy at West Point, a member of the class of 1907, and one of the most popular officers at the local post. His father is the well known Methodist minister, formerly of San Jose. Lieutenant Bane has been ordered to the Philippines, and the young couple will leave for the new post immediately after the wedding.

Living in Their Chafing Dishes

At the front door of the hotel which I have in mind the wagon of a well-known, high-class grocery firm stops every day and sometimes three or four times a day to deliver small groceries to "light housekeepers" in the hotel who cook their meals in their rooms over burning alcohol in pans and chafing dishes to save the expense of the dining-table and the cafe. Sometimes a dinner is served in this way for the amount of a near "generous" tip to the waiter. At the doors of these rooms, every morning, stands the pint bottle of milk—for the baby, of course; but sometimes there is no baby, and the milk is used in the morning coffee of the inmates. It's a strange vanity—this striving for social prestige at the cost of personal pride and native dignity. But there are hundreds of persons "rooming" in the fashionable hotels of this city who ought to be living in the flats and cot-

MISS ELLA MARGARET BENDER

Whose engagement to Philip Young of Boston has been announced. Miss Bender is the eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. David Almon Bender, formerly of Carson, Nevada, and sister of Miss Cherry Bender. She is a talented girl, and has appeared frequently for charity, in readings and amateur dramatic performances. She is a favorite in literary and artistic circles, and has had the benefit of much travel. She is a niece of Mrs. E. B. Crocker of Sacramento. When she graduated from school with high honors, her aunt testified her appreciation through the presentation of a check for ten thousand dollars, and later, her cousin, Mrs. J. Sloat Fassett, wife of the United States Senator, took her abroad. Miss Bender has spent many seasons abroad and in Washington, and she has just returned from Boston where she was been pursuing a special course of study. The wedding will take place in June at the residence of the parents of the bride, and after a few months of foreign travel the young couple will return to Boston to make their home where Mr. Young is connected with a bank.

tages of Ashbury Heights. They are the shabby genteel of our social environment, aping the manners of the rich on the income of a navy lieutenant or a floor walker of a big retail dry-goods establishment in the shopping district. They are content to "put up a massive front" on two scant meals a day cooked in their rooms at the swell hotel, to save money for silk attire and fine raiment in which to "pay their social obligations." It is a pseudo-aristocracy more in the manner of Dickens than that so lovingly described by Thackeray—these hotel climbers and snobs are of the Lammle type rather than that of Rawdon Crawley and Becky Sharp. They are not snubbed by those with whom they seek to associate, but the contemptuous toleration with which they are "received" would humiliate any sensitive person, but so aspiring are these poor folk that they are willing to endure any humiliation to achieve their social ambition. It is a sordid, cringing, brummagem ambition; but it is seemingly very satisfactory to those who debase themselves to its tyranny.

A Sentimental Puzzle

Rumor hath it that as soon as the Carolan party returns from Coronado and the Grand Canyon, another society engagement will be announced. Ever since her formal presentation two years ago that charming girl, Miss Mary Keeney, has stood at the head of the list of local beauties, and she has been one of the most feted as well as one of the most lavish entertainers of the smart set. During her first season Dame Rumor shrewdly connected her name with that of Sammy Hopkins, whose sister Florence was her intimate friend. It was only a boy and girl affair and came to nothing, but the whisper is abroad now that she is formally engaged and will make announcement of the fact on her return. As the first hint is said to have come from her own family the wise ones are ready to affirm that there is more than wind in the rustling of leaves, but what is puzzling Miss Mary's most intimate friends is the uncertainty as to which of two devoted swains is the favored one. As both have been most assiduous in manifesting devotion and keeping her supplied with hot house blossoms there is no clue to the solution of the problem, and society is on tenterhooks until its pardonable curiosity is satisfied.

A Title Rejected

In the haunts of the elect there is much gossip these days anent the turning down of Baron Von Schroeder by the Pacific-Union Club. Fancy a genuine blown-in-the-bottle representative of the old world nobility getting the foot from an American club of doctors, stockbrokers and captains of the various vulgar industries! The bare thought is enough to shake the ancient capitals of Europe and precipitate indignation meetings wherever there is blue blood of ancient vintage coursing through veins aristocratic. Baron Von Schroeder is one of the proudest and haughtiest gentlemen in local society. A man

AMBASSADOR AND MRS. BRYCE AT DEL MONTE

Right Honorable James Bryce and Mrs. Bryce arrived at Del Monte somewhat late on Saturday evening, but despite our unexpected and unprecedented thunder storm, they managed to visit the points of interest and enjoy the natural advantages of the vicinity. There were the grounds about the hotel, and the presidio to visit, as well as the old Mission of San Carlos, which latter edifice, venerable, if not ancient, impressed the ambassador by its beauty and the excellent state of its preservation. After lunch, accompanied by Mr. H. R. Judah and Mr. and Mrs. H. R. Warner an automobile trip was taken to the laboratory of Professor Loeb, who explained at some length the experiments on which he is engaged. The seventeen-mile drive was then gone over and the Ambassador showed the same comprehending interest in the rock formations, and the hoary cedars that he evinced in the work of Professor Loeb. Fortunately, the sun remained out bright and warm until the party reached Monterey Old Town, when the lowering clouds gave due warning and all speed was made back to the shelter and warmth of Del Monte. The art gallery engaged their attention during the evening, and at all times, the moving pictures made by the guests in the brilliantly lighted parlors and lobby. On Monday morning the Bryces left Monterey for San Francisco. Ambassador Bryce is to address the students at the University of California.

of superb physique, he cuts a very fine figure; looks the part on all occasions. He came to this country to bestow his hand and title where they would be likely to do the most good, and he has always been appreciated in society. Prior to his Pacific-Union Club experience he fared very well save when he sought vindication in the courts after having been slandered by the Call. He got vindication after a long struggle, but first he experienced a grilling at the hands of D. M. Delmas that he will never forget. Better perhaps never to have sought the vindication than to have invited the grilling. But why was the Baron turned down? That's the question that puzzles society. He was not "pilled," his name having been withdrawn, but why should it have been necessary for the friends of this gallant nobleman to withdraw his distinguished name? Echo answers, "Why?" But the gossips are more communicative than echo. Some surmise that the grim old dragons who guard the precincts of respectability are prejudiced against the Baron on general principles. Others say that there is prejudice against him because he was ungallantly selfish in seeking vindication. But conjecture is prolific enough to fill a book. However, there is no accounting for taste in club circles.

Tragedy in Society

A canine duel to the death enlivened the serenity of the James Follis household the other day, and Mrs. Follis is plunged into the depths of sorrow through the outcome of the tragic encounter, for it was her pet dog, which accompanied her everywhere, that fell victim to the superior strength or tactics of its opponent. The victor was also a pet, the property of Miss Wilkins, and it was the aggressor in the contest. Despite the best efforts of the ladies, who endeavored to separate the belligereants, they hung on like grim death, and the ministrations of the hastily summoned veterinary were unavailing to save or prolong the life of the Follis dog. Miss Wilkins was, naturally, deeply affected by the behavior of her favorite, and immediately dispatched a sympathetic note and offering to make good the loss in any way that was possible to her. Poor Mrs. Follis is not to be consoled.

Cupid Meeting With Opposition

There are rumors of an engagement and also of the possibility of wedding cards preceding the announcement. There is parental hostility to the work of Cupid, and it stands in the way of a public announcement of a privately accepted fact, and friends are confident that the Gordian knot will be cut by recourse to a quiet marriage with or without the parental blessing. The willing bride to be is a sweet and stately blonde, the elder of two sisters. There is no apparent reason for opposition to the match save that papa appears to have a deep-rooted aversion to breaking up his household. He took the same attitude twice before, threatening to disinherit those who crossed his will, but they were undeterred by the contingency and the probabilities are that this third couple will follow the example set them, the more so as they have the assurance of the countenance and encouragement of their friends.

A Ball for Miss Walker

The return of Miss Genevieve Walker for a six-months' visit to Mrs. Eleanor Martin has been hailed with great delight by the younger set. Genevieve is a brilliant girl with a good dash of unconventionality which adds to her charm. She is a step-granddaughter of Mrs. Martin. Her mother was Clara Martin, the eldest daughter of Mr. Martin's first wife. Since Mrs. Walker's marriage her home has been in Philadelphia, and it is in that city that Genevieve made her first social bow. She received most of her education in a convent school, Eden Hall, just outside Philadelphia, and a fellow student once described her as "at once the delight and the terror of the nuns." Certainly she is the life of any gathering she attends, and already she has been the recipient of much social attention, any number of teas and luncheons being given in her honor. Mrs. Martin is planning a big ball after Easter, to be given for her, which goes to prove there was nothing in the rumor that the ebullient Genevieve incurred the displeasure of the amiable dowager on her last visit. There was talk, shortly after her departure, of an episode at a Greenway Assembly, that was of such trivial significance that I was surprised that anybody should have supposed that Mrs. Martin had given it a thought. Since the return of Miss Walker, which bids fair to give fresh impetus to the fag end of the season everybody is wondering whether Ward Barron will be as assiduous in his attentions as ever. Margaret Barron has been Genevieve's intimate friend since convent days.

The White House Belle

The election and inauguration of President Taft have been the means of bringing into the forefront of society a new style of belleship, for, the only daughter of the household, Miss Helen, being a student of Bryn Mawr college, it follows as a matter of course that the friends she will gather around her and the customs they will conform to in their entertainments will be those dear to the hearts of college girls. Not that the White House is to become a sort of college annex overrun with charming maidens who occasionally drop in to a class room or condescend to listen to a lecture, just to keep up the illusion that they are studying, for Bryn Mawr is not the sort of college which is but a rest-house for society, nor is the Taft family of that class which indudges in passing fads and contents itself with superficiality, so Miss Helen's seasons of relaxation will be only such as fall to the lot of students in general. Her mental training and general reading I am told, have been superintended to a considerable extent by her father, and the result of his oversight is evident when it is made known that Sir Walter Scott is her favorite author and that, on her graduation from Miss Baldwin's school in Washington she gained a three-hundred dollar scholarship at Bryn Mawr. The Tafts have always been well-to-do, but despite that fact and the modern tendency to despise the domestic arts, Miss Helen has been carefully trained by her mother, so that in case of emergency she could take the management of the menage into her own hands and run it without a hitch. Thanks, also, to her mother, she has excellent taste in dress, and does not affect quantities of bizarre jewelry, garish color combinations and extreme styles. Blue is her favorite color, dark for street wear and the lighter shades for house and evening dress, while her white gowns usually have a touch of blue somewhere about them. Though the Roosevelt "Tennis Cabinet" is dissolved, the courts of the White House will probably be maintained, for Miss Taft is a tennis enthusiast. She swims and rides well, and is a good pedestrian, in a word, athletic without being amazonian. According to all accounts this new daughter of the White House is a representative of the best class of American young womanhood, wholesome, moderate and self-restrained. With something of her father's sense of humor to carry her through trying situations inevitable to her position, and the tremendous advantage of family tradition and example on the side of quiet moderation, in the acquisition of Miss Helen Taft as nominal leader, the younger set of Washington should find a distinct gain.

annual race meet on Friday afternoon furnished some good sport for lovers of fast ponies. There were five contests the first and last of which were won by W. Fritz Nave of Riverside on his own pony, Beatrix. The really important event on the card was the second, the race for the A. B. Spreckels trophy, for which the rivalry was unusually keen. Charles W. Clark had two entries, Joe Ross, winner in 1907, and his newly acquired Fulletta. Parsons rode the former and Marsh was up on Fulletta. Dr. E. B. Boeske of Santa Barbara entered three ponies, Blue Knot, winner in 1906 and 1908, Katherine and Viesca, but he scratched the latter two, and pinned his hopes on the gray gelding. Hamilton and Williams entered Matchfulla, and W. Fritz Nave's colors were carried by Annie Burke, while R. F. Carman, Jr. entered Natty Bumppo. Marsh on Fulletta and O. W. Boeske delayed the start considerably by hanging back. The race was for a mile and a quarter, and at the quarter mile Blue Knot led with Natty Bumppo second and Fulletta last, but Fulletta came up, passed the field and won an exciting race by half a head from Natty Bumppo. The finish was so close that many onlookers thought Natty Bumppo had won. Time, 2:14 4-4. Mrs. Clark, who was in an automobile next the judges' stand, was profusely congratulated on Fulletta's victory. A third win will give the handsome trophy permanently into the keeping of Mr. Clark. A race, three-quarters of a mile, for galloways, was won by Harry Messmore's Andavari, owner up, Harry Weiss's Gab second, and the veteran sportsman Burkhill Jacques' Sorosis third. Mrs. Clark was again the recipient of congratulations when Bas Blanc, nominated by her, carried the copper jacket to victory in the Ladies' Plate, beating Blue Knot and Annie Burke in a half-mile race.

The World of Fashion

Perhaps one cannot go so far as to assert that character may be foretold from millinery, but at any rate it is the most eloquent adjunct of a woman's attire. It certainly betrays her mood and almost as certainly the condition of her finances, so, a word in season—Girls, be careful in the selection of your spring hats. Not only will you reveal yourself to every perspicacious on-looker, but you may make or mar the effect of your entire costume. The millinery this spring seems designed to express moods, and there is endless variety in the expression. There are the rather sombre grays, relieved by dull plum and peculiar amethyst shadings, or old rose, bright brown and dull blue, like the plumage of birds. These colorings will appeal to the girl of quiet, refined tastes. The sweet, demure girl will be apt to choose dove gray combined with pink, or she may prefer a touch of bright scarlet or burnt orange. Bright green will prove an economical selection, for it harmonizes well with everything, and always looks so fresh. The extreme style of the hats shown thus early in the season are somewhat exaggerated and trying for the average woman. At present the coarse basket weaves in mushroom styles prevail. Leghorn hats, too, are in great favor, but whatever the style, each and all demands a wealth of hair display. It might go hard with the importers of millinery did they not find in the hair dressers such able adjutants.

One of the finest displays of new millinery is to be found at D. Samuels' Lace House, where having but just moved down town, both the store and everything in it are fresh and up to date. Their representative proved a mine of information, specific and general and was most courteous in dispensing it. Out of the wealth garnered some grains of wisdom are here presented. Flowers and fruit are much in favor as garnishment, and the indications are that they will continue to be so, and even more as the season advances, as by means of them effective summer and garden hats can be produced without great cost. Considering the earliness of the season the flower specialties have caught the fancy remarkably well. Ostrich plumes, fancy feathers, Mephisto quills and wings are shown in all the newest colorings, and velvet and satin ribbon are greatly in vogue, as they give such a dashing effect in a bow added to a hat. Jet is extremely popular, being used in every shape, sometimes in beads as large as marbles.

As to size there does not seem to be much hope for diminution. The crowns are not to be lower, but more in the Directoire style. There is a wide range of color and combination, wistaria, old rose, old blue, burnt orange, reseda, Napoleon blue and black, appearing to divide popularity. Questions as to price are always difficult to answer definitely, if for no other reason than the difference in opinion as to what constitutes a moderate and what a high price. The imported models for the Lace House have been individual selections and they have met with a most gratifying reception. The establishment, however, prides itself more on its own line of popular priced hats, possessing individuality and attractiveness, and designed to sell at from ten to twenty dollars. They are proud of the skilled workmanship, and are pleased to call the attention of their customers to this line, which compares favorably with the importations. Amidst such a wealth of beautiful creations it would be impossible to select one or two for special note. All are equally worthy of distinction.

As to the Hair

"Visit a hairdresser" is the advice of the milliner, who sees the effect of her handiwork likely to be destroyed through lack of a proper hirsute foundation upon which to display it, and the representative of the Emmanuel Hair Store proved to have some interesting information and statistics to dispense. "It is indeed a strange condition of affairs," said he, "that the milliner, who, with her varying styles helps to create the demand for extra hair, is gradually rendering it more impossible to secure it, and will doubtless, in a very short time, smother the hair industry. In any case, the finer qualities will not be procurable for even double the present prices. To support the present day fashions in head gear, it is necessary for every woman not gifted with exceptionally luxuriant locks to eke out her scant growth by the addition of puffs, curls, a pompadour, a switch or a "transformation." The peasant girls of Europe formerly parted with their wealth of hair in exchange for cheap jewelry, gaudy shawls or bright ribbons, the articles of adornment for which they vied with each other, but the French hair traders unwittingly included amongst their goods for exchange cheap millinery, which appealed to the fancy of the rural maids. They are laying aside the caps which were formerly a part of their picturesque costumes and donning the hats and bonnets of the cities. As a natural result they find themselves as much in need of hair as are their fashionable sisters. Add to this, a general inclination on the part of the European government to step in and interfere with the industry of shearing the peasant women like lambs, and it is easy to forecast the end of the hair harvest. Before long a piece of "extra" hair will become a vertiable luxury. It is claimed that in the neighborhood of a hundred thousand pounds of export hair has been gathered each year from the women of Normandy and Brittany alone. A peasant woman is usually willing to part with her hair every second year, the shorn locks growing in that time to the length of twenty-four to twenty-six inches. This wonderful growth, however, is not to be found amongst the "women of the world."

The Leading Millinery House

Mrs. Lynch having just lately returned from her regular spring trip to the East, invites the ladies of San Francisco and vicinity to inspect her Mammoth Display of Spring Millinery. She is showing models designed after the latest Paris, London and New York ideas, at prices so reasonable and styles so varied as to fit any face, any purse and any demand. Her special ready-to-wear black vorday hats are one of the best values in town for the money, which fact is evinced by the big demand for them.

Mrs. J. Coghlan & Co. announce their spring opening of French models and novelties and also an exclusive line of fine millinery. The very name, "Coghlan," is identified with exclusiveness and perfection in the minds and memories of San Francisco. 1526 Bush street, near Van Ness avenue.

Blemishes Eradicated

There is no facial blemish more annoying to a sensitive woman than a growth of superfluous hair, and the experience of hundreds of victims is that the resort to shaving or pumice stone and the application of pastes and depilatories only aggravate the disfigurement, the hairs invariably reappearing stronger and thicker than before. Electrolysis, though a slower method, is the only infallible treatment, for when a hair follicle has been killed by the point of the electric needle it never revives. There is no disfigurement of the skin when the instrument is skillfully used. Miss M. Underwood, who has spent five years in studying the best methods of employing electricity in the eradication of superfluous hair, warts, moles and other facial blemishes, has opened parlors at 702 Market street, room 406, where she is prepared to exercise her skill for the benefit of the alflicted. Two years of Parisian experience, upheld by the personal endorsement of patrons are testimony in her favor. A trial demonstration is offered free to those who are interested.

Madam Olga has returned from the East and has opened her new store at 237 Post street near Grant avenue, where she is now displaying the latest creations in imported hats, bonnets and exclusive waists. Centrally located in the heart of the shopping district, this beautiful millinery store is one of the attractions on Post street.

Richard Carle at the Van Ness

During the coming two weeks Richard Carle, author, composer and comedian, will make his first stellar appearance in San Francisco. He will open his engagement at the Van Ness Theatre Monday night in his newest musical comedy, "Mary's Lamb." Although the tall comedian has never played on the coast, he is well known through "The Tenderfoot," "The Mayor of Tokio" and others of his musical plays, which have been presented here. "Mary's Lamb" is a naturalized French farce. The Carle adaptation is from the original French, but the adapter has laid all the scenes in this country. The leading character is Leander Lamb, a hen-pecked, but secretly giddy husband—the role assumed by Mr. Carle. Miss Cecilia Rhoda appears as a retired actress who has charmed Leander. There are bevies of pretty young women who appear as cowgirls, grisettes, society buds, models, Dutch girls, athletic girls and shadowgraph girls. The latter are an interesting feature, posing in fleshings while Miss Rhoda sings about "The Modest Little Model." Mr. Carle has written not only book and lyrics for "Mary's Lamb," but he has composed the music as well. Many of his songs have proved popular, especially such as "Betsy's the Belle of the Bathers," "My Madagascar Maid," "I Idolize Ida," "Jamais d'la Vie," "We're Hollandaise," "If No. 1 Met No. 2," "Never Borrow Trouble" and "Love is Elusive."

Ossip Gabrielowitsch

A more interesting and charming pianist than Ossip Gabrielowitsch has never visited this city. Some six years ago he played at the old Alhambra, and at that time he was the only musical attraction, with the exception of Kubelik, that Daniel Frohman had ever managed. Mr. Frohman had heard him in Paris and was so impressed by the way in which the artist reached the hearts of his audience that he resolved to make him famous in America. The success of the tour was tremendous and three years later Gabrielowitsch came again, but reached San Francisco so soon after the disaster when our musical population was widely scattered, that the audience which greeted him was smaller than before. However, things are different now, and with talent mellowed and ripened to a wonderful extent, according to the New York critics, there is no doubt but that he will receive a splendid welcome when he appears in Christian Science Hall next Friday night, April 2. Gabrielowitsch has been called the "poet of the piano," and that explains his charm. Technically his equipment is perfect, but it is in the soulful depth of his interpretation of the great composers of the romantic school that he excells. On this first occasion he will play the "Italian Concerto" by Bach, Schumann's "Carnivale," twelve of the Chopin preludes, Henselt's "If I Were a Bird," Brahms' "Rhapsodie," op. 119, and a new composition of his own, "Melodie in E minor." His second concert will be given on Sunday afternoon, April 4, and the novelty on this occasion will be the "Elegy in variation form," by Daniel Gregory Mason, a young New York composer; Beethoven's beautiful "Sonata" op. 31, is also on the program. The last concert will be given Tuesday night, April 6. Complete programs and seats ready Monday at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s. Gabrielowitsch plays in Oakland Wednesday afternoon, April 7, at Ye Liberty Playhouse.

"When We Were Twenty-One"

That perennially popular comedy "When We Were Twenty-One" will be presented at the Alcazar. "When We Were Twenty-One" was the finest play in which Nat C. Goodwin and Maxine Elliott jointly starred. It served them as a starring medium three seasons. The old Columbia Theatre was crowded every time they presented it there, so most local playgoers or half-a-dozen years ago are acquainted with its interesting plot and remember its intensely gripping situations and surprising climaxes. It is one of the daintiest and most charming of comedies, and will doubtless enable the Alcazar company to score another artistic triumph.

Peg Woffington at the Valencia

Notwithstanding the tremendous success of "The Halfbreed," the last performances of that stirring comedy drama will be given at the Valencia Theatre this Saturday and Sunday afternoons and evenings and on Monday night "Pretty Peggy," the romantic and beautiful play by Frances Aymar Mathews will be presented on a most elaborate scale. The story tells of the ambition, love affairs and success of Peg Woffington and shows her first as a singer and dancer in the traveling company of Madame Violanti, at Dublin. She enters on the back of a donkey, but her surroundings have not kept her beauty and cleverness from attracting the attention of David

The second act reveals her in the full enjoyment of her promised career, entertaining the most famous beaux and literati of the day in the historic green room at Covent Garden, but worshipping Garrick with a faith that cannot be shaken by reports of the actor's infidelity. The last act shows the stage at Covent Garden set for the Forest of Arden scene in "As You Like It," in which Peg is to appear as Rosalind. The surprising climax of this act and of the play is so novel and impressive that it were an injustice to prospective witnesses to describe it. The full strength of the Valencia Stock Company will be called upon for the cast and in the titular role Blanche Stoddard will have a splendid opportunity to shine.

Bispham at the Greek Theatre

David Bispham, the great American baritone, has been invited to give a concert at the Greek Theatre under the auspices of the faculty of the University of California, and has rearranged his tour in order to comply with the request. The event will take place on Saturday afternoon, March 27, at three o'clock. The uncertainties of the weather conditions have been provided for, and should an open air concert prove impracticable it is announced that the program will be carried out in Hearst Hall, which is conveniently located on the campus and near the car line. The selections will be really fine, including works by Handel, Secchi, Mendelssohn, and other masters, and the numbers which will especially attract are: "The Erl King," which no one else sings like Bispham, "The Two Grenadiers," the "Prologue" from "Pagliacci," the great Scotch ballads "Edward" and "Tom the Rhymster," Lincoln's favorite, "Oh Captain, my Captain," and "Danny Deever." At the request of the Department of English Literature he will also repeat his wonderful interpretation of "The Raven," with incidental music. On account of the enormous seating capacity, as well as to give students an opportunity to hear this great piece of work with nominal expense the prices for this occasion will be 50 cents and $1, just half the usual Bispham rates. Seats are on sale at the usual places in Oakland and Berkeley and at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s in this city.

Dan Sully as "Father Daly"

The last performances of the greatest musical comedy success of the season, "The Gingerbread Man," will take place at the American Theatre this Saturday afternoon and evening and at the Sunday matinee Daniel Sully will begin a week's engagement in "The Matchmaker." The role of Father Daly, which Mr. Sully portrays, is said to give the popular actor great opportunities for the display of that rich Celtic humor for which he is famous. In "The Matchmaker" he has another "Parish Priest," the play in which he starred so successfully for several seasons, but the present play is much stronger dramatically. The scenes are laid in a little frontier town in Idaho, where Father Daly, the pastor of the local church, has great trouble in controlling and governing a wayward flock. In Father Daly, Mr. Sully has a role that fits him to perfection, having plenty of the comedy of the characteristic Sully type, while the dramatic situations give him better opportunities than have been afforded him in any of his previous plays. The production is identical in every respect with the one he gave in New York.

Another Etlin Concert

Henri Etlin, the young French pianist, all of whose concerts have been most successful and most artistic will present a particularly interesting program at his next appearance at Century Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 28, at three o'clock. M. Etlin was a student under Diemes and Mathias, and a First Prize winner at the Conservatoire in Paris. His technique is faultless and his interpretations full of poetry. The program on this occasion will be composed entirely of French selections, most of which M. Etlin studied under the composers themselves. There will be also a group from the old French masters. The full program is as follows: "Es-

The Last Pop Concert

The last of the present series of "Pop" concerts at Lyric Hall will be given this Sunday afternoon at half past two o'clock, and Manager Greenbaum announces it as "An Afternoon with Schubert." The artists who will assist the Lyric String Quartette will be Mrs. Celia Decker Cox, contralto, Miss Therese Ehrman, pianist, Miss Lydia Reinstein, accompanist, and Mr. A. Nielsen,

The program is as follows: Quintette for two violins, two cellos and viola, the Lyric String Quartette and Mr. A. Nielsen; Songs: "Nur wer die sehnsucht kennt," "Die Forelle," "Erstarrung," Mrs. Celia Decker Cox, accompanied by Miss Lydia A. Reinstein; Trio, op. 100, No. 2, piano, violin and cello, Miss Theresa Ehrman, Mr. Hofman, Mr. Villalpando.

Orpheum Vaudeville

A most inviting program is announced for next week at the Orpheum. The Eight Melanis, excellent Italian vocalists, will appear in an elaborated act which is the outcome of a smaller one known as the Melani Trio which for many years has been popular in European and American vaudeville. To the original Trio have been added two prima donnas and three male vocalists. A beautifully picturesque scene showing the Tower of Pisa has been provided for the Melanis and lovers of good music may be sure of a great treat. Tom Nawn, one of the few legitimate delineators of Irish characters, will present a mythical comedy, called "Pat and the Genii," in which he will have the assistance of Mrs. Nawn and Charlotte Appelle. The Four Casting Dunbars, American athletes, will present a daring and sensational act. From nickel plated bars elevated high above the stage they toss each other back and forth with grace and precision. A double somersault by a member of the quartette as he is passing from the hands of one of his companions to those of another is among the many exciting features. Charles Matthews, the champion jumper of the world, assisted by Doris Reece, will introduce a novel act without the aid of a spring board. With his feet bound together he leaps from barrel to barrel and covers a distance of eight yards in two jumps. He leaps in and out of barrels over eight or nine tubs and chairs, clears a piano forte with one spring and does some wonderful vaulting. Next week will conclude the engagement of the Four Pon-

The William Shakespeare Lectures

Twenty dollars' worth of singing lessons, besides an incalculable amount of general musical information is what Manager Will Greenbaum promises to those who attend the lectures given by William Shakespeare, at the small cost of a couple of dollars. Shakespeare is one of the great masters of singing, and no better exhibit of his work could be cited than David Bispham, who proudly proclaims to everyone, "Oh, you know, Shakespeare was my master." Mr. Shakespeare is a thorough musician, having been successful as pianist, composer, singer and orchestral conductor, and his works on singing are recognized as standard throughout the world. His first lecture will be given on Saturday afternoon, April 2, at Christian Science Hall on "The Art of Singing"; the second will be on Monday night, April 5, on "Singing Considered Historically." Seats, $1 and $1.50, will be ready Monday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, Sutter and Kearny streets. As many out of town teachers and students will wish to avail themselves of this opportunity, Mr. Greenbaum announces that he will personally attend to mail orders sent in his care. Special rates will be made for parties of over twenty from schools, colleges, clubs and other organizations by making application to room 505, Koenig Building, corner of Post and Kearny streets.

A Successful California Singer for the Big Festival

Manager Greenbaum was for a time fearful that he would be unable to find a singer for his great Easter Festival. He had engaged a great orchestra a splendid chorus and one of the world's greatest pianists, but lacked a vocal soloist without which a music festival would scarcely be complete. One day his eye fell upon a despatch in a New York paper announcing the return to America of Miss Elsa Thorsvald, a California primadonna, who had been singing with great success at the opera house in Elberfeld, Germany. Greenbaum had heard Miss Thorsvald some seven years ago before she went abroad and had never heard of her progress, but at that time he was greatly impressed with her capabilities. He immediately wired to New York and the Hamburg-Bremen Steamship Company sent out a wireless with his offer and last Monday the single word came back, "Accepted." The 11th of April, Easter Sunday, is going to be a red letter day in history of music in San Francisco.

Frederick Ranken and Henry K. Hadley's Musical Comedy, "Nancy Brown," in which Marie Cahill captured New York will receive a superb production next Monday night at the Princess. May Boley will have Marie Cahill's part of Nancy Brown. She is delighted with it and recognizes that its many possibilities will afford her a splendid chance to distinguish herself. The Princess Beauty Chorus will be in pleasant evidence in new and magnificent costumes and a thoroughly perfect ensemble will gratify those who attend. "The Sultan of Sulu" will be played for the last times this Sunday afternoon and evening.

Ye Liberty Playhouse

The new bill to be offered Oakland playgoers at the Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, Monday evening next is "The Importance of Being Earnest," a comedy from the pen of Oscar Wilde. It was played here originally by Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin at the old Baldwin Theatre, but theatregoers across the bay have never been afforded an opportunity of seeing it in their home city. "The Importance of Being Earnest" is one of the daintiest of Wilde's epigrammatic comedies. Every line of it sparkles with his wit, and the plot and situations are splendidly worked out. The supporting cast will include Helene Lackaye, Katharine Mulkins, Lillian Elliott, Landers Stevens, George Friend, E. L. Bennison and several others.

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

Norfolk Coats, Knickerbockers, etc.

Owing to the popularity of the Automobile the only fancy sack coat a gentlemen may safely wear has come again in vogue. This fancy sack coat is popularly called "The Norfolk" jacket, and with it can be worn either long trousers with permanent cuff, riding breeches or knickerbockers. The style of trousers, however, depends entirely on to what use you may put the suit. Should you use it for automobiling either a pair of knickerbockers or turned up trousers are best, for walking or tramping or golfing knickerbockers are the only thing and for equestrians, of course the riding breeches.

To attain what is commonly, and perhaps best described as smartness in outing dress by far the greater majority of men are apt to put aside all individuality and doggedly follow the leader. No matter how sensible or good a style may be they

Stripped Knickerbockers

Striped "Norfolk" Coat

either pass it by because it is not what all the world is wearing or because they fancy that the world is through with it. As a matter of fact one is as great a mistake as the other in point of view, for while it requires far more knowledge of fashion, and much more natural style as well as refinement of taste to be successfully independent individuality is a prime factor of smartness. There is absolutely nothing new under the sun, and styles repeat themselves only with variations. The "Norfolk" jacket is by no means a common style, but it is a standard dress for country wear both here and in England where it originated. The reason for this is that it is worn on pastime occasions which only the lovers of true sport or the moneyed class can enjoy. For this same reason again we shall not find these suits in every ready to wear clothes shop, but made by trading tailors or exclusive ready to wear shops, and worn by many men quite regardless of the prevailing modes. Although the subject of much variation in detail the simple styles of Norfolk are the best, and among them the most popular is the one cut with a yoke and only second to that style shown by the accompanying drawing. The material should not be one of the fine texture-like worsted; on the contrary either a soft surfaced fabric, with slight stripes, plaid or mixture pattern or a light or dark spun or rough tweed or Scotch cheviot.

The knickerbockers illustrated are of the same material as the coat, indeed must be so if the suit is to be complete, which is always to be recommended. There is nothing new to distinguish them from the fashions of the past seasons, except that one should guard against having them too full at the thigh, as this is apt to make them look ungainly. For tennis, golf and general outing purposes, at outing clubs and in many country places one sees as much of the flannel trousers and they are considered the better style of the two, but for the mountains, for camping, tramping, fishing, shooting, etc., nothing can be compared to them in point of comfort and good form. Indeed the "Norfolk" jacket and knickerbockers suit is so well adopted to the mountains, that it is almost as much associated with them as blue serge with the sea.

had been persuaded to arm himself. The man from whom he obtained the pistol had to show him how to use it, he was so unfamiliar with the use of fire-arms.

It was about 11 o'clock that morning when Gov. Patterson heard of impending trouble. He set forth with his private secretary to find Col. Cooper. Robin Cooper, in the meantime, according to his story, had lost trace of his father. They all came together finally at the Maxwell House about noon. Robin Cooper had armed himself. His uncle, Robin Jones, had given him a pistol to "protect his father." Col. Cooper was ready to send the note to Carmack about which he had spoken the previous night to Craig.

Gov. Patterson, Robin Cooper and James C. Bradford, who had now entered the situation as "peacemakers," say they persuaded the Colonel not to send the note, but to give it to Bradford. Bradford was to see Col. Shook, a stockholder of the Tennesseean, and have him use his influence to make Senator Carmack desist from further use of Cooper's name. Bradford was to report the result of his mission to Cooper at a conference to be held at his office at 3 o'clock. But Bradford didn't see Col. Shook because Shook happened to be in New York, and at 3 o'clock that afternoon there was a conference of Bradford, Col. Cooper, Robin Cooper and Tully Brown, Adjutant-General of the State. The defense has asserted that as a result of this conference Col. Cooper decided to drop the whole controversy with Senator Carmack. As the conference was breaking up, according to the defense, a telephone message was received from Gov. Patterson inviting Col. Cooper to visit the Executive Mansion. Gov. Patterson testified that ten minutes before he sent this invitation he had received a telephone that Col. Cooper had decided not to do anything in "the Carmack matter." But neither the Coopers nor Bradford nor Brown nor the Governor thought of informing Senator Carmack to pay no attention to any threats which he might have heard.

On the way to the Executive Mansion Robin Cooper saw Carmack approaching, and tried to hurry his father and get him turned in another direction so that he wouldn't see the Senator. But Cooper caught sight of Carmack and immediately, according to the testimony for the defense, said that he would go over and speak to him and expostulate with him against the further use of his name; that Carmack knew him and he knew Carmack, and he could talk to him.

According to Mrs. Charles H. Eastman, a representative of the best blood and breeding in Tennessee, Senator Carmack had paused to speak to her near two telephone poles when Col. Cooper, coming up behind her, said: "Now I've got the drop on you," or "Now, we've got you." Senator Carmack had his hat raised, and it is Mrs. Eastman's testimony that, answering the challenge in her rear, the Senator looked over her shoulder. "A look of good fellowship and good comradeship" disappeared from his countenance and was succeeded by one of "surprising inquiry."

He pulled his hat down on his head and his hand went to his hip pocket. Mrs. Eastman saw the handle of a pistol outward; the weapon seemed to catch. She swore that she didn't believe the Senator even got the pistol turned round to fire it.

Senator Carmack's action of drawing a weapon was accompanied by a step toward the curbing, and a voice which had spoken from behind Mrs. Eastman called the Senator a dastardly coward for hiding behind a woman and told him to get in the open. Mrs. Eastman, who was accompanied by an infirm kinsman, appreciating there was about to be a fight, ran into an open gateway, dragging her kinsman with her. She heard three shots. As she turned round Senator Carmack was falling into the gutter dead and Col. Cooper was standing to the north of him with his right hand outstretched in the attitude of one about to fire a pistol." Mrs. Eastman saw no weapon in his hand. Robin Cooper was to the south of Senator Carmack and the telephone poles. Mrs. Eastman swore that she denounced Col. Cooper as a brute and as a murderer, and told him she would rather be Senator Carmack dead in the gutter than Cooper alive and his slayer. Col. Cooper denied this denunciation. Three bullets, each one hitting a vital spot, were shot into Senator Carmack. One was in the back of the neck. This bullet went through the exact back of his standing collar, cut the spinal cord and came out through his mouth. The other two entered his left side toward the rear and ranged forward and downward, passing through the heart.

The evidence as to the exact number of shots fired was conflicting. There are persons who swore there were three shots all together of a sound-character indicating that Robin Cooper fired first.

The State's contention was that it didn't matter if Senator Carmack fired 40,000 shots, he was justified in everything he did with the threats he had received and which had not been withdrawn coming uppermost in his mind at the approach of Col. Cooper from one direction and Robin Cooper from another.

In impeaching Duncan Brown Cooper the State went into his past, and from the records it produced it laid the ground to argue that he had no honor left to be wounded by such impeachments as "diplomat of the zweibund," "a bald-headed angel named Dunc Cooper," and as a politician powerful enough to bring together such enemies as Gov. Patterson and ex-Gov. Cox.

"I bear on my shoulders the weight of fifty-two years of shop work," growled a heavy voice from somewhere in the rear of the room. It was the voice of a man who, by virtue of his age, had spoken first. 'And I know more than the rest of you. I've been in many a factory in my time, and I ought to. I started when I was twelve. I've always said it would be far better for everyone if the proprietors could be obliged to make some provision for those of their men who can no longer work. You all know already what happens when there is no compulsion—disabled, knotted hands, and an empty belly."

"I, with fewer years," rumbled another voice, "have still more experience. Let us take unanimous action, keep our secret and spoil their material, their tools, their everything and anything, what you will. We can, without danger to ourselves, make them lose time; we can found their metals badly, weave their materials worse. In a single year there won't be a factory in Spain with a peseta's credit——"

"No!" shouted a third voice in a raw tone. "Nor a workman with bread!"

"The eight-hour day! Give us the eight-hour day!" roared a brawny chorus.

"Good counsel—to be dogs eight hours instead of nine, eh!"

"Raise the pay! Make 'em come up wi' the union scale!"

"And have them also raise the cost of clothes, bread, houses, if they can—until they tax the air we breathe!"

The bootless squabble might have gone on until dawn had not a voice, until then silent, broken sharply into the discussion. It was a huge voice, a roar that impeached the little, wizened body from which it poured full-throated, a voice that thundered an indomitable will in spite of its owner's size.

"We haven't come here to squabble, but to avenge a cruel wrong!" it bellowed. "Have you nerve enough? Yes or no?—answer me! I know where there are three dynamite cartridges, weighing from five to six pounds apiece. One we can use on the model shop, which is what they value most; another on the owner's house—in the rear, where the family generally is; the last one we can hold in reserve, in case one of the others should not explode properly. We can draw lots for the chance, and whoever pulls the black straw does the job!"

A prolonged silence greeted the cold-blooded, horrible proposition of wholesale murder and arson. Some were held back by the pure horror of the proposal, others by the fear of punishment. In the spirit all were accomplices before the fact, but the flesh was very weak; no one said: "I will dare it."

Gasparon was quickly on his feet, took a couple of pulls at his cigarette, walked over to stand under the lamp, so that they could read in his face the firmness of his resolution, and spoke plainly to the plotters.

"This is either all nonsense or all infamy. A 'Widows and Orphans' Fund' or pensions for them, with money? You are dreaming! A strike? What for?—to stumble and fall upon your faces for weakness when there is nothing left in the house to eat? To stay in pawn to your very last rag until obliged by hunger to return to work, at the owner's terms? The proposition of the dynamite is the savagery of a coward!—for my part I will not assassinate anybody! Leave the vengeance to me. I will see that it is ample and not easily to be forgotten."

Some of the men murmured in surly disapproval, and others accepted the big fellow's proposal with good grace. The pusillanimous for fear, and the more exalted because they all saw in Gasparon's eyes something tremendous and mysterious, agreed to his undivulged plan, and the meeting was dissolved like one of those passing summer thunder showers whose bolt is not shot.

The day following Gasparon posted himself on the street to beg, directly in front of the palatial residence of the factory-owner. Supplications, threats offers of all sorts to get him to go away, were in vain. There he remained. He was there when the rich man, new lord of the modern feudality, came out to go to his work, to the exchange, to his varied amusements; when the senora, his lady wife, returned to pray; and when the children, the fair daughters of the house, went out to balls and parties, dressed in their daintiest shimmering frocks. There he stayed, close to the grating of gilded ironwork tracery about a window through which the ample silk curtains blew in soft folds. There he could be seen from dawn to dusk, showing his mutilated stump of an arm, resting the ragged bulk of his great body against the marble facade of the building, and always wearing about his neck, fastened by a cord, a neat little printed sign, bearing this inscription:

"Crippled and Rendered Useless in the Factory of

Auto Notes

The Pioneer Automobile Company are in receipt of a letter from Otto tum Suden, advising that the road to Santa Cruz via Los Gatos is now open and is in fairly good shape, with the exception of a 20 foot bog half a mile this side of Edgemont. Mr. tum Suden reports that his party was the first to go over the route this season. The road in the vicinity of Watsonville is passable but rough in places.

Messrs. Robert and William Belcher of Berkeley have been trying out their new Thomas tourabout in short jaunts to San Jose, Livermore, etc., and report the roads in a fair condition. Robert Belcher says: "The only bad spot on the trip to Livermore is in the town of Haywards, where we went up to our hubs in mud. Fortunately we had one side of our car on dry ground and our guests all stood on the running board on that side and we then had no difficulty in pulling out. The other members of the party were Mr. King, Harry J. Lenscott and Belcher Cooley.

On or about the 15th of the present month, the Howard Automobile Company will move to its permanent home, 523 to 533 Golden Gate Avenue, where the "Buick" models will be exhibited after the above date. The rapidly increasing business of the Howard Automobile Company has long ago reached such proportions that their present facilities are entirely inadequate to meet their demands. The new home of the "Buick" will be modern in every way and with every convenience necessary to care for the great volume of business which the admitted steadily increasing popularity of "Buick" automobiles requires.

Motoring Guests of Nero's Castle in Treves, Germany. They have been touring Europe in their Packard "30" and have covered 20,000 miles.

Telegraphic dispatches from the Studebaker "scout car," yesterday to the local Studebaker branch announced its arrival in Marshalltown, Ia., at 6 o'clock, on the previous evening. The car is reported to be still running fine and that there seems to be no end of bad snow drifts. The car is on en route to Belle Blaine.

Mr. C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast Manager of the Diamond Rubber Company has just returned from the northwest, where he went to open up the new branch house in Seattle. Mr. Mathewson reports the automobile show at Portland a very successful one, and that as usual at automobile shows, Diamond tires equipped the greater portion of cars.

Two of the newest arrivals on Automobile Row, are the six cylinder sixty horsepower Oldsmobile, and the thirty horsepower Chalmers-Detroit limousine. The Oldsmobile is rated at seventy miles an hour and is built along the well known lines of the Oldsmobile construction. With 130 inch wheel base, semi-eliptic springs and the body well balanced between the axles, the six-cylinder Olds has the unusual riding qualities well known in this make of cars. This is the first of the Olds sixs of 1909 to arrive. The Chalmers-Detroit Limousine has the appearance and power of the average $4,000 car. Seating six people, the new machine can take the Golden Gate Avenue hills easily on the high speed, and has developed 45 miles on the boulevard.

Five carloads of Studebaker-Garford cars including several cars of the suburban type and a carload of Studebaker E-M-F "30' cars were received yesterday (3-18) by the Studebaker Bros.' Company of California. Included in the E-M-F lot were several cars of the roadster type. These as well as the new Garfords are attracting considerable attention.

During the Automobile Show held recently in Buffalo, N. Y., the Centaur Motor Co., agents for the Oakland car, sold at retail during the week of the show 26 Oakland cars. This large number of sales was due in part to the "boosting" done by enthusiastic owners of '08 Oaklands, 73 of these cars having been sold in Buffalo last season.

Among the prominent motorists who are expected to spend part of the coming season touring, is Charles S. Wheeler. The regent of the State University toured Europe last season with his six-cylinder Thomas Flyer and will probably be among the participants in the proposed tour to the Alaska-Yukon Exposi-

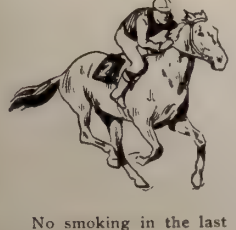
Letters



Juvenilized Shakespeare

"There was a man that wrote a book,
And very well indeed it took;
So then another man, he went
And then another man, he went
The man that wrote the book.
But seeing this, another took
The hint, and said: "I cannot brook
That others only should succeed.
And so he wrote a lengthy screed
About the man that wrote about
The man that wrote the book."

Shakespeare wrote his plays, and very well they answered the purpose of both drama and literature until it occurred to Charles and Mary Lamb to do them over for the benefit of children. That was the beginning of the avalanche for since then every book, ancient or modern, and even the Antediluvian Scriptures have been diluted and juvenilized. Now comes an improver on the improvements, a "Shakespearean series for children" based upon the boiled Lamb, and entitled the "Lamb Shakespeare for Young People," which includes "a new arrangement of skillfully inserted passages and scenes from the principal plays together with illustrations and some harmonious settings for the songs," and the concoction is recommended as being "well adapted to familiarize the child with the great dramatic masterpieces." It is more than a question how much of the dramatic masterpieces is left after two dilutions. In the golden age, before children "studied literature" and had their minds weakened by juveniles and juvenilizations, little folks of eight and ten used to regale themselves on the masterpieces as they were written, and if their unsophisticated intellects were unable to understand all they read, at least they were not misled by the prudery of editors and adaptors, who, nowadays, deliberately change the plots, relations of the characters, and plain statements of vital facts, with a view to "protecting the innocence" of their victims. Any child who is liable to be corrupted by Shakespeare, Scott, Dickens or George Elliott, is already past hope of salvation. Any one, old or young, who is incapable of assimilating a square meal will profit little by the diluted gruel. There are children, even yet, despite the mind-weakening processes of modern educational methods, who wonder "what was the use in Shakespeare taking the trouble to write those big books if other people think they can do it better." What the same children will think of those who feel called upon to rewrite what the "other people" wrote remains yet to be seen.

A Book of Guidance

The Correspondence Manual put together by William Hickox for the guidance of stenographers, typewriters and clerks will prove a handy addition to the desk equipment, though it is not, nor is it designed to be a text-book or "correspondence course." Much of the advice tendered is of the sort which the old-fashioned term, "natural gumption" would cover; common sense, attention to duty and the practical application of experience, rare virtues in these days when the average employe has his mind set not on what he can put in but what he can take out of every occupation. The list of words commonly misspelled is not so lengthy as that usually presented, but the author's suggestion that each should make his own, comprising such errors as he, individually, is likely to fall into, is a valuable hint. The right and wrong use of words and the brief glossary of terms used in law, railroad, insurance and financial transactions make convenient ready-reference. It is to be hoped that the lists of business streets and buildings for other cities have been compiled with greater care than those given for San Francisco. Most of such information, as far as this city is concerned, is negligible since the sudden and rapid changes of the last few years. But it is doubtful if even the oldest inhabitant could locate Alameda and Eldorado streets as important business thoroughfares, and out of a total of fifteen, there are two misspelled. Beale is given as Beals and Kearny, one might almost say, as usual, is spelled Kearney. Taken at the author's valuation, as a supplementary guide to knowledge previously acquired, the Correspondent's Manual is worth the small price of fifty cents to any one who has occasion for business correspondence whether for firm or private use. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard are the publishers.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

League of Justice Patriot—(1) You need not fear that the Prosecution will exhaust its resources. The stories that seem premature inasmuch as the jury has not yet been impaneled are merely for the purpose of preparing the public mind. The Gallagher dynamiting yarns designed to implicate Calhoun are like the trivial episodes in the first two acts of a drama. The big climax is to come. Be patient. (2) Yes, I am in the confidence of the Prosecution, but I cannot tell you what they have up their sleeve. I can only hint. Let it not surprise you if it should turn out that a certain man who committeed suicide in the County Jail left a confession between the layers of leather in the soles of his shoe, in which he admitted that he had been hired by Calhoun to assassinate a lawyer, a judge and a civic patriot and also to commit suicide. Let it not surprise you if it should turn out that Calhoun is the man that stole the money out of the City Treasury.

Inquirer—(1) Certainly. (2) You are quite right in your conjectures. (3) Not if it gives you any pain.

Voter—(1) No, the direct primary will not put the "machine" out of business. (2) You should not believe all that you read in the newspapers.

Taxpayer—(1) Yes, the Park Commission has opened an office in the Mills Building. (2) Yes, the Park Lodge is supposed to be the headquarters of the commission, but we have more money than we can spend and that is why we are helping out poor old D. O. Mills whose building is half empty.

THE TRIALS OF FRIENDSHIP.

Young Author (after reading manuscript through aloud)—There! what do you think of that?

Patient Friend—I think it's good; I fancied that she would marry him in the end.

Young Author—You did? Oh, dear! I am disappointed. I thought that only an uncommonly bright person would guess that!

—The Secretary.

EQUALLY IMPRACTICABLE

Agent (who has been trying to sell farmer a bicycle and discovers that he has spent his money in purchasing a cow)—You'll look very funny riding into town on a cow.

Farmer—But I'd look funnier trying to milk a bicycle.

WAIT AWHILE

Daughter—What! Mother, do you mean to say that I must marry that horrid Mr. Jones? I hate him, I detest him, I despise him!

Mother—But, my dear, you can tell all that after you are married.

"So she got a husband! How did she ever make a man happy?"

"She got a divorce from him."

Ambassador Bryce Dissents From Wheeler

The Right Hon. James Bryce gave the students of Berkeley some good wholesome advice the other day. He advised them to be citizens of the world and not of one small locality; to be citizens of the past and the future rather than of the narrow present; to make themselves familiar with the problems of mankind, and to think a little less of the affairs of their own nation and more of the affairs of other nations. It would be greatly to the advantage of the students of Berkeley were Mr. Bryce to remain with us awhile and deliver a few more lectures calculated to abate the scholastic tendency to provincialism and to excite interest in the history both of human opinion and of mankind. These are studies that are very much neglected at our universities, and it is in consequence of this neglect that many of our so-called educated men, laboring under the delusion that the world of thought is an undiscovered country, flatter themselves that they are entering on new domains of speculation when they are only treading the old weed-covered paths of dead faiths and worn-out philosophies. While it may be true that without this delusion the life of speculation would expire, it would surely be well were we less disposed to cheat ourselves with illusions of scientific, philosophic or religious discovery while treading paths that have been beaten hard by long extinct generations. It would also be well were students generally to be impressed with the importance of having their minds diverted from absorbing contemplation of the petty problems of local and immediate interest. In this connection it is interesting to note that Mr. Bryce's sentiments are at variance with those of the provincial President of the State University. Not so long ago Mr. Wheeler, in a public lecture, deprecated the practice of sending American university graduates to Oxford, where, as he said, they could not be equipped for a career in this country. In Dr. Wheeler's philosophy American problems are the only ones that are worth while.

Shaw Tickles the British Groundlings

In England there has been much rejoicing over George Bernard Shaw's characteristic philippic against this country which was inspired by the Poe centenary. The elation of Mr. Shaw's countrymen which has found expression in terms of mock compassion for what they are pleased to term the United States of Philistia, is in proportion to the indignation that has been aroused in this country among persons who take the Celtic philosopher seriously. Shaw is probably as much amused by the smug affectation of superiority in England as by the rage that he provoked on this side of the water. Shaw is above all things a humorist, and being a humorist he is at heart too much of a cosmopolite to differentiate philistines on geographical lines. It is absurdly supposed by some American writers that Shaw is animated by a personal grievance against everything and everybody in the United States because our ridiculous puritanism is intolerant of his amusing dramatizations of sex problems. The fact is that Shaw's blasting reproaches are from the head, not from heart. The bitterness of his censure is an affectation. What he says about us is partly true; that which is not true is permissible under the license of exaggeration which is accorded to all humorists. Therefore it must not be supposed that George Bernard Shaw is inspired with the insular bigotry which causes many of his dull-witted countrymen to exult inordinately at the smashing that he gives Americans. As scornful of them as he is of the Philistines and Puritans of this country, he has swatted them hard and often. He knows that in proportion to population they are as numerous in England as in America.

The Conceit of a Nation

Self-satisfaction is a characteristic of the people of this country. We have always been pleased to ascribe the jibes and sneers of foreigners to envy and national prejudice. We lose sight of the fact that we induce criticism by taking ourselves too seriously and indulging to often in invidious comparisons. We have not outgrown the habit of prating of the greatness of our responsibilities as a nation. The conviction is widespread that the eyes of the world are upon us; that this is the most enlightened country on earth; that in the matter of integrity we are superior to all other peoples, and that this is the only, the glorious land of freedom. Exaggerated self-esteem, whether in an individual or in a nation, is bound to excite aversion. It is well for us to be proud of our country and its achievements, but it is better to be conscious of defects and sensible of opportunities of improvement than to be intolerant of criticism and given to fatuous boasting. We only make ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of the world when we claim to be the most enlightened and the freest people on the globe. Public opinion in this country, which is not always an enlightened opinion, is a greater tyrant than any monarch in Europe. And the present tendency is to increase its sway and its power. Once upon a time we boasted that we had been reserved by Providence for the exemplification of the most beneficent theory of government that was ever vouchsafed to man; yet today our faith in that theory is flickering to extinction; public opinion is revolutionizing our system of government, the system to which we are indebted for whatever degree of greatness we have attained.

Impudent Autocracy

In view of Shaw's criticisms on this country somewhat grateful is the opportunity for retaliatory derision which has been supplied by the London Censor of Plays. As everybody knows England has been thrown into a spasm of hysteria by the play "An Englishman's Home." A crude, illogical drama, designed to rouse the military spirit of the nation by pointing out the danger of an invasion, it has stirred the emotions of the populace as though an ultimatum had arrived from Berlin. Thousands have been enrolling for the national defence; the country is in a state of wild excitement over a play which sets forth the physical horrors of an invasion. The sober critics of London have pronounced the play a drama of sentimental claptrap, and the buncombe of it was so inspiring to a writer of burlesques that he dashed off a skit on it which was promptly accepted by a theatrical manager. That skit has not been produced. The Censor of Plays has solemnly announced that no skit upon an "Englishman's Home" will be passed by the Lord Chamberlain. In a discussion of the matter G. K. Chesterton, who is as good a humorist as Shaw and a much better philosopher, says, "The thing represents a new stride in impudent autocracy which might make Peter the Great jump out of his boots. Many tyrannical Governments have said that certain jokes were not to be made at all. But very few have ever gone so far as to say that certain public topics were not to be joked about at all." We are able to boast that we have no Censor of Plays, but it is worthy of note that within a month there has been agitation in favor of the appointment of such a functionary in New York where there is still prevalent a little of the spirit that was rampant in some of the colonies that first settled this country.

The Fiction Mill

The Chicago Inter-Ocean, commenting on that perennial topic of interest, the earnings of authors, quotes a publisher as saying that about ninety-five per cent of the novels published are failures and that not more than ten per cent of those published last year paid their authors a fair day's wages for the time spent in writing them. A sale of five thousand copies of a book by an author who has not gained a firm standing in the literary world is good business. At the usual royalty that means five hundred dollars for the author. The life of a modern book is about six months, and the author must gather in his shekels in that time. Novels were brought out during the year 1908 at the rate of five per day, and as it is fairly well established by experience that about one in fifteen of those which are submitted is found worth printing, a little elementary arithmetic will go to show that in America alone there were some twenty thousand works of fiction written last year. Those of us who are prone to cavil at the quality of the fiction offered the literary palate may here find food for thought. If the one in fifteen which is accepted falls so far below our standard of satisfaction, what must be the value of the fourteen which are rejected?

Class Distinction in a Seminary

They seem to be having an interesting time in New Jersey, where the daughters of the rich attending a fashionable private academy have vented their spite against the daughters of the richer by setting fire to the building on several occasion. Debarred from the felicity of rivaling the plumage of the gayer birds they hoped at least to have the satisfaction of singing the fine feathers. Most of these exclusive institutions are schools in name only. All they are designed for is to put a bit of polish on the metal submitted to them, which in these degenerate days seems odd, since good breeding is looked upon as a mark of servility. The antics of a coterie of the cadets of society at one of the big coast resorts once caused someone to remark that if they were the servants of the establishment they would be summarily dismissed without characters, to which the pertinent reply was made, "Well, and do you expect people in society to behave like servants?"

Public Sentiment is not Outraged

In this easy-going and complacent community many simple souls are disposed, we are told, to view with something akin to indignation the recent invasion of private offices ostensibly for the purpose of searching for stolen property. We are told that this remarkable excursion conducted in the interest of justice and under the crippled forms of law has caused something in the nature of a revulsion of feeling among certain high-minded, law-abiding citizens who have hitherto regarded as salutary and honest everything that has been done under the benign auspices of the little group of civic patriots who have modestly dedicated themselves to the cause of civic righteousness. We hasten to announce that we do not give credence to all that we hear. We who have tracked the subtle windings of official crime, pursued its dark unwearied course beneath the surface of busy life, and observed the practice of medieval hypocrisy, cruelty and imposture in the white light that beats on the twentieth century civilization of an American city, are not to be deceived by the report that the hideous but logical outcome of the infamous spy system has wrought deeply on the sensibilities of this callous community. Studiously mindful of Professor Boke's oracular pronunciamento that "everything the Prosecution does is right," we are convinced that this bewildering and ecstatic generalization is binding on the laughter-loving people of the new San Francisco. What Colonel Henry Watterson may think of the situation does not concern us at this time. There is higher authority that we find it refreshing to consult, but only for the reason that it indicates the incapacity of great minds to grasp some of the simple problems that have confronted the officers of the law in San Francisco. Take for example Lord Camden who discussed the subject which we are now considering in the celebrated case of Entic vs. Carrington. Lord Camden's decision in that case is one to which frequent reference is made by our courts. The Supreme Court of the United States has said in the case of Boyd vs. the United States that the principles laid down by Lord Camden affect the very essence of constitutional liberty and security and apply to all invasions by the government of the sanctity of a man's home and the privacies of life. What Lord Camden said among other things was this: "Papers are the owner's goods and chattels; they are his dearest property, and are so far from enduring a seizure that they will hardly bear an inspection." Speaking of the blanket search warrant he said, "We cannot pronounce a practice legal which would be subversive of all the comforts of society," and he added: "By the laws of England every invasion of private property, be it ever so minute is a trepass." This memorable decision we are told by our own federal Supreme Court, "was welcomed and applauded by the lovers of liberty in the colonies as well as in the mother country." But why should we of San Francisco, in the twentieth century, we who abhor crimes against the legislative branch of the government, but have no prejudice against perversions of justice or the flagrant misuse of judicial power at the dictation of the freebooters of journalism—why should we concur in the conventional sentiments that prevailed more than a century ago? It may be as our Supreme Court has said that according to Lord Camden, "general warrants for search and seizure originated with the Star Chamber and never had any advocates in Westminister Hall except Chief Justice Scroggs and his associates," but Camden is a back number and Boke's is the guiding mind of the hour, and as for Scroggs, have we not witnessed his reincarnation on the bench in San Francisco? No there is no widespread indignation in this community over any recent happening howsoever infamous it may seem to the few who are sensible of the masked purpose by which it was animated. This community that tolerated Ruef for several years and complacently learned of the plot to grant him immunity is not to be aroused by any injustice that may be visited upon Patrick Calhoun.

Perspective Impressions

Has anybody heard a protest from the League of Justice?

The danger of the blanket warrant lies not so much in what the spy may take out of your safe as in what he may put into it.

If temperament counts for anything now that Padcrewski has rheumatism he ought to be able to make the piano writhe in agony.

There is no great loss without some slight gain. The eight-year old Willie Whitla, kidnapped and held at $10,000 ransom, learned to tie his own shoes while in bondage.

Mr. Harriman says he wants to build a union passenger station in San Francisco but that he will not be "held up." Consequently we must be patient for awhile.

"It will never be a natural thing," said Lord Halifax, "for men to take extravagant pains for the mere sake of doing good to others." Evidently Lord Halifax had no prescience of the civic patriots of San Francisco.

The Chronicle concludes that as the new Mayor of Los Angeles stood for civic decency in the recent "recall" election the other candidate, who was nominated by the Socialists, stood for indecency. Have we not yet learned that a candidate for office is not to be judged accurately either by what he stands for or by those that stand for him?

Letters from a Juryman

In Which Democritus is Called Upon by His Special Correspondent on the Calhoun Jury to Furnish Him with Authentic Information Regarding the Latest Strategic Move of the Spreckels Prosecution Under Direction of "Gumshoe Bill" the Detective.

Cell 1036, Hotel St. Francis,
March 30, 1909.

My Dear Democritus:

What are these rumors that reach us in our cloisteral seclusion about "Russian methods" in the American city of San Francisco? Is it true that the District Attorney's office has been converted into a department of the "third section?" I ask for information, so that when I meet the jurymen who will hereafter be sworn to try this case I may be able to discuss this latest phase of the graft prosecution intelligently and with knowledge. It isn't fair that half of us should be fully informed concerning the tactics of the District Attorney while the rest of us are compelled to remain in profound ignorance.

What little has reached us regarding the raid on the offices of the United Railroads indicates that there is an effort in process, apparently incited by "Gumshoe Bill" the detective, to create a public opinion in San Francisco, so strong that it will be impossible to obtain a jury in the Calhoun case. I may be wrong in this supposition, and it will be impossible to verify the suspicion until after we have learned what effect the prosecution's use of "the right of search" has had on the jurors of venires to be summoned this week. As I write it seems to me that the process of jury getting in this case is virtually ended. I am certain that if I, an American citizen, were again called to answer the questions of the lawyers concerning my opinion in this matter, I would tell them that I disapproved of what are called "blanket search warrants" and the indiscriminate application of the law relating to "domiciliary visits."

Of course I am only partially informed in this matter; and I cannot speak even "advisedly"; but from what we have heard it seems that an outrage has been perpetrated similar to that which precipitated this country into war with Great Britain in 1812; and upon precisely the same grounds of complaint, namely, abuse of the right of search. As the story leaks in to us it is incredible, and I ask you to smuggle the facts to me as soon as possible. I think you can depend on the discretion of the waiter who pours my coffee.

What did "Gumshoe Bill" the detective expect to find among the records and papers of the United Railroads? What did he find? Are you sure that the alleged "confession" of "Gumshoe's" private secretary has any basis in fact? or that it was not a deliberate "frameup?" I have heard even in this seclusion that the cause of the prosecution is very desperate and that District Attorney Langdon has frequently remarked that unless something was done immediately the Calhoun case would be lost in spite of all that Special Prosecutor Heney can do. This result, I can well imagine, would convert the Heney rocket into a swift-descending stick; it would utterly discomfit and probably utterly paralyze the entire Spreckels-Phelan prosecution. But I do not see how the "Russian method" will assist the plans of the prosecution. It can only have a contrary effect upon the opinion of the business community. "If Gumshoe Bill" the detective, armed with the brief authority of a shystering police court and a personally conducted District Attorney, can break into the cabinets and safes of the United Railroads, he can burglarize, under cover of the law, any other businessman's office. No citizen is safe from a blanket search warrant sworn to by an employee of Spreckels' private detective agency, or by "Gumshoe Bill" himself. The businessmen of San Francisco will assuredly protest against such assumption of authority and against such enforcement of that authority.

We jurymen have discussed this matter upon the meager information at hand and we have arrived at the conclusion that if what we have heard is corroborated by the facts as they shall be hereafter communicated to us, our verdict must be in favor of the defense—not upon the evidence that shall be offered for our consideration but upon the broader principle involved in the "inalienable rights" of American citizenship under the Constitution of the United States.

We do not propose, however, to jump at our conclusion. There are many things to be considered before we render our final verdict—if we are permitted to go that far in the determination of this case.

As I write this letter, it seems to me that as far as this jury is concerned, there can be but one result. Future jurors will naturally be influenced either for or against the prosecution by what the agents of the prosecution have done. These jurors will come to their examination as to qualification to serve on the jury, with a "fixed opinion." If that opinion is contrary to the purposes of the prosecution they will be challenged by Mr. O'Gara or Special Prosecutor Heney "for cause"; if that opinion is favorable, they will be "passed." It will lie with the court to allow or disallow these challenges. If the court allows the challenges of the prosecution and disallows the challenges of the defense, on the ground that the juror's opinion regarding "Russian methods" of "Gumshoe Bill" the detective are incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial to the issues of this case, the defense will be compelled to use its peremptory challenges to rid the jurybox of jurors partisan to the prosecution. I don't know, of course, whether this is the purpose of the prosecution in this apparently high handed outrage upon the law of the land and the rights of American citizenship; but if any other purpose was intended it must have been very asinine, for, as I am informed, nothing was accomplished nor could have been accomplished upon the ostensible purpose of the gumshoe department of the District Attorney's office. As I understand, the charge by "Gumshoe Bill" the detective was to the effect that some documents had been stolen from his office and were concealed in the safes or cabinets of the United Railroads. If the charge was based upon a fact of theft, the effort to recover the papers in the manner that was adopted was a clear expression of "Gumshoe Bill's" opinion that the lawyers and agents employed by the United Railroads are a bunch of Mutt's surpassing in stupidity the imaginary character pictured by Bud Fisher to assist his ridicule of "Beany" and his goat and the curl papers of "Tobasco's" mustache. It isn't likely that the receivers of these stolen papers, if such papers were really stolen, would keep them where a search warrant could recover them. Therefore, I reiterate my opinion that this raid on the United Railroads had a purpose ulterior to its ostensible design. It may have been a "fishing excursion" to get at anything which might be valuable to the prosecution; or it may have been intended to so excite public indignation against the prosecution that it will be impossible to impanel a jury in the Calhoun case. Future events will determine which of these deductions is correst.

In the meantime, I ask you dear Democritus, to let me have any information concerning this last phase of the prosecution campaign that you can safely convey to me; and get it to me as speedily as possible.

Yours, still in custody,

—Jurybird.

Two Friends

By Alec Clark

(Translated from Guy De Maupassant)

Paris was besieged and famished, struggling in her death agony. Few sparrows were left on the housetops, and the rats of the sewers were vanishing: people were feeding on anything they could obtain.

M. Morissot, a watchmaker by profession, but called by the situation to serve as a volunteer, was walking sadly along the outer boulevard one bright January morning, with his stomach empty and his hands thrust into the pockets of his uniform. He stopped short before a comrade in arms in whom he recognized a friend. It was M. Dufour, a riverside acquaintance.

Every Sunday before the war Morissot had set out at daybreak with a bamboo rod in his hand and a tin box on his back. He took the Argenteuil train to Colombes, then went on foot to the eyot at Marante. Arrived at this scene of his dreams he began to fish; and he continued fishing till nightfall.

Every Sunday he met there a round and jovial little man, M. Dufour, the draper of Rue Notre-Dame-de-Lorette, like himself an enthusiast of the fishing-rod. They often spent half the day side by side, with the line in their hands and their feet dangling over the stream, and they had struck up a friendship.

Sometimes they talked; sometimes they passed the whole day without a word. But their companionship was complete without any need of words, for their tastes were alike and their feelings the same.

Sometimes on a spring morning when the sun came out in restored youth, covered the tranquil river with a light vapor which floated down with the current, and poured on the backs of the two enraptured fishers the genial warmth of the new season, Morissot would say to his neighbor: "Glorious, isn't it?" and Dufour would reply: "There is nothing like it in the world." And without needing to say more each understood and esteemed the other.

And in autumn, at the close of day, when the sky, blood-red as the sun was setting, threw on the water reflections of scarlet clouds, flooded the whole stream with purple light, showed a band of flame along the horizon, made patches red like fire or shone golden on the trees already russet and shivering at the approach of winter, M. Dufour would turn to Morissot with a smile, saying: "What a gorgeous sight!" And Morissot, still keeping eyes fixed on his float, would reply with a rapturous "Ah! this is better than the boulevards; eh, old friend?"

As soon as the two friends recognized one another they vigorously shook hands; the meeting in such altered circumstances filled them with emotion. M. Dufour, with a sigh, said: "What dreadful things have been happening!" Morissot groaned in yet deeper dejection: "And what weather: This is the first fine day of the year."

The sky was indeed quite blue and full of brightness.

They began to walk side by side, gloomy and preoccupied. Morissot continued: "Remember our fishing, eh? That's one pleasant memory."

"When shall we do any more?" asked Dufour.

They entered a little cafe and took an absinthe together. Then they returned to their walk along the boulevard. Morissot suddenly stopped. "Another drop, eh?" M. Dufour agreed, "I'm with you," and they went into another wineshop.

Their heads were turned a little when they came out, for fasting men are easily affected by alcohol. A caressing breeze played on their faces, and the warm air sent the absinthe yet more to M. Dufour's head. "Suppose we went there?" he asked, pausing to give his words weight.

"Where?"

"Why, to our fishing."

"But where?"

"To our island, of course. The French outposts are near Colombes. I know Colonel Dumoulin, and they will let us pass without difficulty."

A quiver of desire ran through Morissot. "Right you are," he said, "I am game"; and they parted to go for their tackle.

An hour later they were marching side by side along the high road. Then they gained the villa where the Colonel was installed. He smiled at their request and acceded to their whim. They renewed their march, furnished with a passport. Soon they passed the outposts, crossed the deserted region of Colombes, and arrived at some little vineyards which sloped down towards the Seine. It was about eleven o'clock.

Across the river was Argenteuil, like a dead village. The heights of Orgemont and Sannois dominated the entire region, and the great plain which extends to Nanterre was empty, absolutely empty save for its naked fruit-trees.

M. Dufour pointed to the hill crests. "The Prussians are up there!" he said; and an uneasy feeling paralyzed the two friends as they looked upon the deserted country.

The Prussians! They had never seen one, but for months they had felt the presence of the enemy, pressing around Paris, ruining France, unseen but all-powerful, bringing pillage, slaughter and starvation. And a kind of superstitious terror was added to the hatred which they felt for this unknown and victorious people.

"I say," faltered Morissot, "what if we met them?"

M. Dufour replied, with that Parisian love of joking which nothing can repress, "We would offer them a fry of fish."

But the silence which reigned around intimidated them, and they hesitated to venture into the country.

At last M. Dufour made up his mind. "Come! Quick march! But let us go carefully." Then, crouching and bent double, with inquiet eyes and ears alert, they crept down through a vineyard, keeping hidden behind the vines. A strip of open land remained to be crossed before they could gain the riverside. They quickened into a run; then, as soon as they had reached the bank, they plunged for hiding among the dry reeds. Morissot put his ear to the earth to listen for any sound of marching in the neighborhood. They heard nothing. They were alone, absolutely alone.

Feeling reassured, they began to fish.

Facing them was the deserted Isle of Marante, which concealed the opposite bank from their view. The little restaurant was closed and looked as though it had not been inhabited for years.

M. Dufour took the first gudgeon. Morissot caught the second; and from moment to moment they whisked back their rods with a little silvery fish quivering at the end of the line. It was truly a miraculous haul. They carefully put the fish into a fine-meshed net bag which was waiting at their feet. A delicious joy penetrated them, the joy which seizes one who has found again a favorite pleasure of which he has long been deprived.

The bright sun poured his warm rays on their shoulders; they no longer heard anything, thought of anything; they had forgotten all else in the world; they were fishing.

But suddenly the earth trembled with a dull sound which seemed to come from underground. The thunder of the guns had begun anew.

A Mammoth Floral Display

The Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition Will Have a Floral Setting of Bewildering Beauty on a Gigantic Scale.

The floral display at the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition is to be one of magnitude and magnificence. Natives and long-time residents of the Pacific Coast take their flowers as a matter of course and little realize how much the prodigality of Nature and the ready response which she makes to our smallest effort affects those from less favored climes, who nurse their callas in pots through the winter and congratulate themselves if they have a blossom to display for Easter, and treasure the common red geraniums that here are scarcely regarded as worth the out door space they take up. The most has been made of the natural surroundings of the exposition grounds, and the blending of them with the formal gardens, walks, paths and drives which have been laid out, but the crowning glory will be the millions of blossoming plants which will be kept in flower or replaced by new species as long as the exposition lasts. Though the opening day is yet two months in the future, already the landscape artists are at work transferring the plants from their winter quarters in the green houses on the grounds. Wild broom and willow trees are being transplanted about the buildings, and evergreen hedges laid out. The mere figures indicating the number of plants of different species are staggering. There are to be three hundred thousand English tufted pansies in a single bed. This pansy differs from the ordinary varieties in as much as it blooms continuously throughout the summer and seems to follow the eyes of the observer, since it always faces the sun. No where else in the world have so many of these pansies been assembled in one bed before. Six thousand Dorothy Perkins roses have been assembled in another mass; eighty thousand daisies have been divided into two beds of forty thousand each, and more than ten thousand each of China asters and Shirley poppies have been set out amongst the roses. Ten thousand gladioli, reaching in a single line for twelve hundred lineal feet are placed inside the Balustrade encircling the court of honor. Forty thousand foxgloves, fifteen thousand Shasta daisies, fifteen thousand sweet williams and twenty-five thousand Canterbury bells for the sunken gardens and other decorative features of the grounds will be required. When the pink and white daisies in the main beds have passed their flowering season they will be replaced by low-growing phlox in colors chosen to harmonize with the roses. Four thousand tall growing phlox plants will line the vista leading from the court of honor to the formal gardens. On the banks to the right and left of Puget Plaza, just inside the main entrance gates, and leading to the group of United States Government buildings and the Cascades, more than five thousand pink geraniums have been set out, and along the street leading to the amusement center, six thousand flaming red geraniums will add color to the gold and silver glitter of the circus side of the great fair. The cactus dahlia, the official flower of the exposition, has been utlized in quantities. Ten thousand of the plants have been set out among rhododendrons, the State flower of Washington. Roses will cover the slopes between the drives, to be replaced by Japanese iris when they cease to bloom.

One of the distinguishing features of the exposition ground is the three radiating vistas which look out over

VIEW FROM MANUFACTURERS BUILDING TAKEN SEVEN MONTHS BEFORE OPENING DAY

Lake Washington on one side and Lake Union on the other, with Mount Rainer towering on the axis of the whole scheme of the fair. These vistas were cut through the great stretches of fir trees in order to furnish the magnificent view of the mountains and lakes seen on every side of the exposition grounds. Great stretches of lawn are on every side of these vistas, flanked by cinder paths, benches, electroliers and other conveniences.

The location of the exposition buildings, on the campus of the University of Washington, is in the midst of a mass of flowers and green lawns set down in a surrounding of natural forest trees, and the effect is far more beautiful than any heretofore produced, where the environment has been less carefully considered and the flowers and gardens made but a small and subsidiary part of the decorative scheme.

It will be a select and representative body of men who will make up the party of one hundred Californians that The California Promotion Committee will take on a special train to Seattle to celebrate "California Promotion Committee Day" at the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition on June 15th. Each of the fifty-eight counties of the State will have a representative and the remainder of the one hundred, which number has been fixed as the limit, will consist of business men of the State. The arrangements for the trip, which is made in acceptance of an official invitation extended by the management of the exposition, are in the hands of a special committee appointed for the purpose, consisting of Frank L. Brown, chairman, Alfred I. Esberg, R. B. Hale, L. A. Nares, and Charles F. Runyon. As in the case of the trip made by The Committee to the exposition at Portland in 1905 every feature of the affair will be unique and distinctively Californian. Leaving San Francisco on Saturday evening, June 12th, the party will reach Seattle on the fourteenth, the day before "California Promotion Committee Day." Following the day especially set aside in honor of these visitors there will be a reception to the party in California Building on June 16th. After the festivities at the exposition a trip will be made about Puget Sound with invited guests on a chartered steamer. On the return trip, leaving Seattle on Friday, June 18th, stops will be made at Tacoma and Portland, where it is planned to extend the Californians some courtesies in the way of receptions and drives. The special will reach San Francisco again on Sunday, June 20th. Aside from the desire to show the people of Seattle through this trip how greatly interested California is in the success of its exposition; the Committee believes the trip will do much to further the cause of a "United Pacific States" with its slogan of "One for All and All for One," the spirit that is welding together the development forces in the States of the Pacific Coast.

Significance of a Big Deal

The sale of the Hotel Rafael property to J. H. Holmes of the famous Hotel Green of Pasadena, is of considerable significance. Be assured that Mr. Holmes, who is a shrewd financier and a man of wealth, has had his ear to the ground, and that he knows something of contemplated developments in Marin County. This, the most beautiful county in California, surpassing all others in the wealth and variety of its scenery, and within thirty minutes of San Francisco, even by our antiquated ferry service, is gracefully emerging from the grasp of the silurians and receiving the attention of enterprising financiers who are quick to discern the potentialities of a region that has languished for want of exploitation. Mr. Holmes has decided to be on the ground at the opening of the era. And Mr. Holmes may be depended upon to lend valuable assistance in ushering in the new era. For several years his big hotel in Pasadena has been the favorite winter resort of rich Easterners, comparatively few of whom have ventured north of the Southern citrus belt. Scarcely any of them ever heard of San Rafael. It will be to Mr. Holmes' interest to make them acquainted with the attractions of Marin County, and to that end he will fill a long felt want with a first-class tourist hotel. In a few days the Hotel Green will be closed for the season and the working force will be transferred to San Rafael.

Abandoned by Society

The deal by which the Pasadena financier became the owner of the Hotel Rafael was put through by Mr. A. C. Blumenthal, who is connected with the Southern Pacific Company, a circumstance that might also be regarded as significant. But I am assured that Mr. Blumenthal, who is a resident of San Rafael, conducted the negotiations in no other capacity than as the representative of Baron and Baroness von Schroeder. It is not to be denied, however, that the negotiations were watched with deep interest by the railroad officials and by the Fosters, Martins and other rich men who own property in Marin County. There was elation enough in San Rafael over the sale of the hotel to justify a public celebration. Long have the people of San Rafael been conscious of the fact that as a fashionable summer resort their beautiful village was losing prestige and for no other reason than that the hotel which once was the favorite resort of the elect had lost its drawing power. The hotel has never recovered from the effect of the unpleasant notoriety from which it suffered in consequence of the unsavory scandal precipitated by the libel suit which Baron von Schroeder instituted against John D. Spreckels. Eventually, after a long struggle, the Baron was vindicated, but he never succeeded in luring society back to his hotel. I believe he has become thoroughly disgusted with the hotel business. Mr. Holmes, I am told, will immediately enlarge the hotel and infuse into it something of the spirit that has made the Green the most popular resort in the South.

A New Tivoli

Though a new Tivoli is so far from realization that it has not yet been put on paper, negotiations with reference to the opening performance are already under way. Somewhat premature, perhaps, but where there is sentiment business must not be expected to take the usual course. The new Tivoli is so far only in "Doc" Leahy's head, but it will not take long to bring the theatre into existence after the police department vacates the site of the old original Tivoli on Eddy street. It is upon this old site that the new Tivoli, a theatre resembling the original, will be reared. It will probably gladden the hearts of theatregoers before the end of the year 1911. Though architecturally of the same style as the original the new theatre will be a steel building. All the familiar features of the old theatre including the 'lovers' walk" up near the ceiling will be reproduced. Manager Leahy has already obtained the promise of Mascagni to come to San Francisco and assist in the dedication of the new temple of music. He has also corresponded on the subject with Leoncavalla and Tetrazzini, and he is confident that these artists will grace and inspire the opening performance.

Husband—Have you heard that they've going to start a museum for antiquities here?

Wife—So? Then I can give them this hat of mine.

Who Discovered the Bay?

I am amused at the misinformation that is being printed and orally uttered by these Portola fiesta folk. They seem to think that Gaspar de Portola discovered the bay of San Francisco. There is no record that Captain Portola saw the bay of San Francisco until he came north in October, 1776, from Monterey on his second expedition to establish the Presidio of San Francisco. It is possible that some of the soldiers of the first Portola expedition in 1769 did discover the bay of San Francisco, for it is recorded that after Portola had made camp on the peninsula near what is now Palo Alto, Sergeant Joseph Francis Ortega and two or three soldiers wandered about in a northerly direction. They may have climbed some of the hills of the San Bruno range, from which they could have caught a glimpse of the lower end of the bay. Evidently, however, they did not know that the water was extensive or that it was an inlet from the ocean to the westward. Yet one of the historians of the Examiner pictures Portola sailing through the Golden Gate! Portola was almost wholly a land soldier. He scorned to be even a horse marine. Whatever he discovered he discovered afoot or a-horseback, after the manner of the post-conquest explorers. Lieutenant Pedro Fages discovered San Francisco bay in his expedition of March, 1772. It was Fages, too, who discovered Alameda on Thursday, March 26, of that year, hastening on to the discovery of Berkeley on Friday, March 27, from which point he also discovered the Golden Gate. While Mayor Taylor and the rest of them are deciding on the spelling and pronunciation of Captain Portola's name they might with profit to themselves and the rest of us study and expound the real history of the event which they propose to celebrate. I don't believe that any of them know much about what they seem so assured of; and I attribute this ignorance to sheer laziness, for the information is within easy reach of them and can be had by the expenditure of labor sufficient to turn a few pages of the records now on file in voluminous quantity at the State University.

A Survival of the Past

There is now remaining only one living link between this early history of California and modern conditions. William Heath Davis, 88 years old, came to California from the Sandwich Islands seventy-eight years ago. He was for many years a merchant of Yerba Buena which afterwards became San Francisco. He was a member of the first ayuntamiento or common council of the city. Davis street was named after him. He built the first brick building in the city, which was the first custom house after the American occupation. Subsequently he laid out the city of San Diego and built the first residence in that city. Mr. Davis married Maria J. Estudillo, daughter of Jose Joaquin Estudillo, owner of the Spanish grant between San Leandro and San Lorenzo creeks and from the summit of the Coast Range to the shore of San Leandro bay. The father of Jose Joaquin Estudillo was Jose Estudillo, the last commandante at the Presidio of San Francisco under Spanish rule. William Heath Davis has seen San Francisco grow from a village of Indian neophytes at the Mission Dolores to the metropolis that it now is; and he is the only man now living who may boast that he saw the beginning of it all. When he has passed away there will be no witness whose testimony is earlier than the roaring forties. But William Heath Davis whose youthful energy helped to lay the foundation of the city and whose later enterprise helped to sustain its prestige, will not sit with those who have elected to honor the memory of Captain Gaspar de Portola. After the vicissitudes of more than three score years he lies helpless in the clutch of old age among the foothills of Alameda county almost within the sound of a far cry from the pasture where roamed his cattle in those pastoral days before his fellow Gringos came. He is all that is left of the "first low wash of civilization" along the shore of this western bay; when he is gone half a century will measure the human memory of the founding of the commonwealth, and there will be naught but written history to tell us what went before.

The "Most Beautiful Woman"

A prize of $100 has been offered by the executive committee of the Portola festival for a photograph of "the most beautiful young woman in the State," to be used as a poster drawing and advertisement of the fiesta. The winner of the prize is unquestionably a very beautiful young woman, but she is not "the most beautiful woman in the State," as the husband of any beautiful woman in California will testify. Beauty is relative as well as comparative. The Greeks established a standard of perfect beauty measurable in inches of bust, neck, waist, hips and height. No woman since the age of Phidias and Praxiteles has been perfectly beautiful according to the Greek standard. And feminine fashion has made the modern woman almost hideous from the standpoint of the Grecian connoisseurs. Recently all women have conspired to make themselves horrors in the sight of men by the awful hats they wear. We frequently read in the Sunday supplements that some woman is "the most beautiful in the world." So far is this from being true, that if the question could be put to a vote of all the people in the world the woman so pronounced "the most beautiful" would be classed among the most unbeautiful. The standard of beauty in China, for example, is so different from the American, the English, the French or the German, that "the most beautiful woman in the world" would be one whose eyes slant askance upon a nose that would fit the face of a mediaeval gargoyle, and it would be impossible to convince at least one-third of the world's population that the woman whose photograph has been selected for a Portola poster is comparable with the Chinese beauty in the line or form of a single feature. Even among ourselves the nearly unanimous opinion concerning feminine beauty is masculine—no woman freely concedes that another woman is "the most beautiful." Consequently I predict that the Portola poster girl will not be declared "the most beautiful" by any proportion of a majority of the women of California.

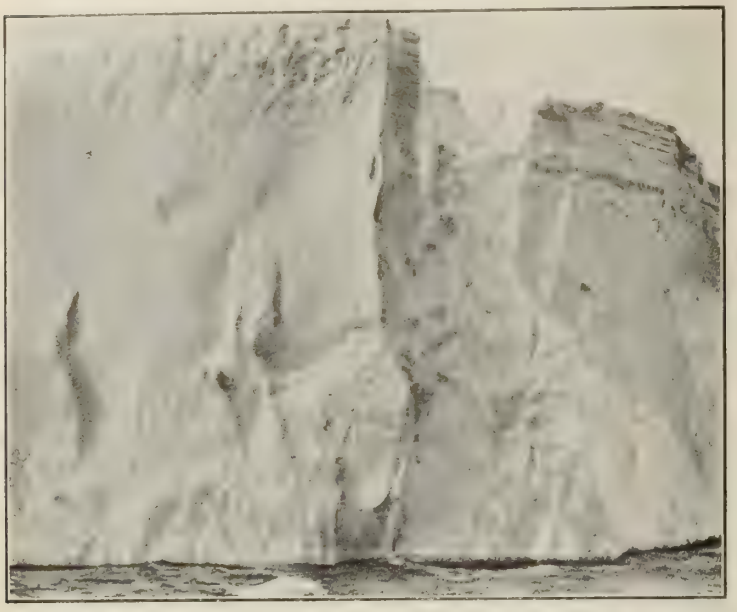
Mrs. Youngwife—Do you know what I've cooked for you today, dearest?

Youngwife—No; do you?

The Famous Hearst Hole

Mr. E. H. Harriman thinks that San Francisco is too young for sky-scrapers, but his opinion will not cause Mr. William R. Hearst to change his plans. The prevailing notion that Mr. Hearst is maintaining a hole at the corner of Third and Market streets for the purpose of advertising the Examiner, is without foundation. While it is true that the hole excites the curiosity of strangers and is the subject of much comment it is not, I am assured, regarded by Mr. Hearst as a satisfactory advertising medium. Mr. Hearst is really desirous of filling that hole with structural steel. It is his purpose to plant a building there, one of prodigious height and noble proportions, and according to present calculations the birth symptoms ought to manifest themselves before the end of the year. The monetary problem which has been entirely responsible for the delay is almost solved.

The Mystery of the Antarctic



With the return of Lieutenant Shackleton from a voyage to the Antarctic interest in that desolate region has again been aroused. Lieutenant Shackleton is reported to have approached within one hundred and eleven miles of the South Pole or latitude 88.23 and longitude 162 east. If he did so then he must be in possession of some very interesting information. He has probably solved the riddle of the great ice barrier which Captain Robert F. Scott inspected a few years ago when he made a trip to the Antarctic on the Discovery. Captain Scott was instructed by the scientific societies that financed his expedition to explore the ice barrier to its eastern extremity and to discover the land supposed to flank this barrier to the eastward or to ascertain that it does not exist and generally to solve the very important physical and geographical problems connected with this remarkable ice formation. Sixty years ago, before Scott's voyage Captain Ross on a visit to the same region encountered the frowning cliff of ice which he traced nearly 400 miles to the east. Captain Scott encountered the ice barrier and found points where it was not twenty feet above the water. Behind it the snow surface rose in long undulating slopes to rounded ridges of tremendous height. Captain Scott satisfied himself that this was snow-covered land. He made an ascent in a balloon, going up five hundred feet and making many novel observations. Nevertheless he left the ice barrier what he had found it—the grand mystery of the Antarctic. He says that it runs over 400 miles east and west as a continuous cliff of ice. To pass beyond it the explorer must abandon his ship and travel over land or over great and ancient snow fields. Captain Scott doubted that extensive journeys would ever be made over these fields of perpetual snow, but Lieutenant Shackleton is reported to have gone many hundreds of miles in a specially constructed motor car in which he expected to make the final dash for the pole.The lands of the Antarctic region were first discovered by Captain Cook in 1773-75. He was the first man to circumnavigate the Southern Polar Continent.

Somewhat Inaccurate Is Teddy

To Dr. Lyman Abbott and Dr. Mabie it has been suggested that if they do not wish to establish for the Outlook a reputation for untruthfulness, they should fire Teddy Roosevelt from their staff. Teddy has been caught lying in the Outlook. The habit is evidently as strong out of office as in. Teddy has been recounting in the Outlook the efforts of the labor unions to stop the manufacture of cigars in New York tenement houses, his purpose being to illustrate how the courts by forced and technical constructions defeat what is morally right and promote what is wrong. He relates that when he was in the Assembly, three years after emerging from college, he conducted the fight for the labor unions against the tenement house cigar makers. A bill was passed which he supported, but it was declared unconstitutional by the New York Court of Appeals. He says the labor leaders had no money to supply counsel to present their case or draw a bill. When the bill was passed he appeared before Governor Grover Cleveland with a few battered looking foreigners, members of the unions, to urge that it be signed. "The main argument," he says, "and indeed almost the only argument, was made by me." The employers contested the constitutionality of the act, "and after the usual long delays," says Roosevelt, "the highest State court finally pronounced the act invalid," and he adds: "The cigarmakers were poor. They had no money and no special influence. They could not employ counsel, either to draw their bill in the first place or present the case to the best advantage when it was before the courts."

What the Record Shows

Now let us examine the facts as disclosed by the records. In the first place, the bill was drawn by Roscoe Conkling, who was paid $5,000 for his services, and who told the labor leaders that even if enacted it would be set aside as unconstitutional. In the second place, when the bill was discussed at the Cleveland conference, Senators Fitzgerald and Grady, and Assembly Roesch, who introduced the bill, argued in support of the measure. Mr. Roosevelt says that several days after the hearing

CLAY STREET, 14th to 15th
OAKLAND

Grover Cleveland "called me up and told me that though he felt very doubtful, in view of the state of facts I set forth he would sign the bill." The fact is that a day or two after the hearing the Governor sent for Assemblyman Roesch, told him he feared the law was unconstitutional, and suggested that it should be withdrawn for amendment. Roesch consulted with the labor leaders and they would not consent to amendment. The statement that the measure was declared invalid after the usual delay is not borne out by the chronology of the record. The test case was started in August, 1883 and on January 29, 1884, the decision was rendered by the Court of Appeals. "The judges," says Mr. Roosevelt, "invoked a technical construction of the Constitution in order to declare invalid a law deliberately enacted by the Legislature." The unanimous opinion of the court reported in Vol. 94 of the New York Reports gives the lie to everything that Mr. Roosevelt says about it.

The Story of a Lease

Not of minor importance among the good things that have been given away by the talented gentlemen who are now conserving the interests of the taxpayers of this city is the lease of the Lincoln School lots at Market and Fifth streets. This lease has made one man rich and enabled two others to put through a very profitable deal. Our municipal authorities, the gentlemen who are prepared to go into the business of government ownership on a very large scale, may be men of great ability, but it is evident from the story of the Lincoln School lot lease that it is possible to catch them napping. They leased that property to O. A. Stewart for thirty-five years at an average monthly rental of $6,750. Mr. Stewart is a speculator, who was not financially able to put up a building on the lot, but he had the ability to demonstrate that he had a good thing. Without even the plans of a building he found tenants for every inch of the ground floor, and obtained from each a bond guarantying a lease through a term of years. Equipped with this ammunition he went on a hunt for capital and he did not have far to go. Two of the directors of the Metropolis Bank, Robert Oxnard and Harry Stetson, took the lease off Stewart's hands paying him $100,000 for it and now they are putting up a building that will cost $350,000, all of which, they estimate, they will get back in five years.

She—It serves you right; everyone told you when you went into business with him that he was the biggest thief in the country!

He—Yes, I know, but I thought I—I—knew more than he did.

Sinclair's Failures

Upton Sinclair's dramatic propaganda of socialism appears to have proved an expensive and disastrous undertaking, for the companies which were sent on the road with the three one-act plays after they were first produced here are back in town seeking other engagements. The leading man and Miss Elizabeth Magee, who won notoriety by advertising herself as the White Slave, and so attracting Mr. Sinclair's admiration, have applied to Mr. Walter Hoff Seeley of the Valencia Theatre for positions in his stock company. Mr. Sinclair has offered "The Second Story Man," his one-act sketch, to Mr. John Morrissey of the Orpheum circuit, and as it has a good plot and some dramatic value, Mr. Morrissey has recommended it for the consideration of the New York head of the syndicate. "Prince Hagen" was given a most beautiful and elaborate presentation at the Valencia, taking in the full strength of the excellent stock company, Mr. Sinclair himself selecting the cast, but the play proved a dire failure. The public would have none of it, and the critics were almost unanimous in condemning it. Then Mr. Sinclair condemned the critics, and laid all the blame upon the actors, declaring that they were not properly cast, and wholly unsuited to the roles they undertook. Naturally Mr. Seeley feels indignant at the aspersions cast upon his company of players. According to his figures, the staging of "Prince Hagen" cost the Valencia Company five thousand three hundred dollars exclusive of the personal expenses of its author, all of which, including hotel bills, telegrams and other incidentals, were defrayed by the management. As to the story itself, Mr. Sinclair is authority for saying that it was the "most rejected" manuscript ever sent out, for it came back twenty-seven times and so rapidly that it made him dizzy. Later, when he published it at his own expense the public rejected it once more, and the dramatic version appears to have confirmed the verdict of the lower courts, but he still has faith in this favorite child of his brain and believes that with a few changes it can be produced with success in the east. The trouble with Mr. Sinclair's theatrical venture is that he is trying to treat the stage as a pulpit from which he can preach the doctrine of socialism, and theatrical audiences have not the patience to sit still and be talked at. Lessons must be conveyed subtly and subconsciously. In this hustling age, people have about all they can do to solve their own private problems and cultivate the art of "forgettery" with regard to worries. Mr. Sinclair is said to have lost valuable manuscripts in the fire which destroyed his experimental colony at Helicon Hall. It is a pity, for the sake of the reputation he has earned from

How Davis "Pilloried" Crane

As though in the nature of an unconscious confession come these words by Richard Harding Davis in an article on "Playing" the Drama, published in a recent number of Collier's Weekly: "And if you rejoice in an enemy, he is at your mercy (in the novel you have written). Under a hideous nom de plume, you can, in your novel, pillory him, and, to your heart's content, ridicule and torture and ruin him, financially, socially, physically, and, finally, lead him to the gallows. In a novel of mine, disguised as the chief villain, there was such an enemy. To him I did everything that my low and vindictive nature could suggest. I made his life a hell, and killed him off in poverty and under circumstances of the most degrading and humiliating nature." This sounds like jesting; but perhaps it is tragic truth. Richard Harding Davis did something like that. He wrote a novel in which he "pilloried" his rival, "ridiculed and tortured him," and, 'tis said, hastened the death of the poor victim of a literary man's malice. The story is told in a long-forgotten novel by Davis, called "The Derelict," but which in its brief hour made some stir among the newspapermen of New York and especially among the correspondents who went to the front in the war with Spain. Stephen Crane who had written a widely popular book, "The Red Badge of Courage," was "the chief villain" of that novel, and the picture was so photographic in its details, that every friend and acquaintance of Crane recognized it instantly—and immediately there was much severe criticism of Richard Harding Davis. In this book Crane was "ridiculed, tortured, degraded and humiliated"; and in a few days he was dead. The doctors ascribed an ordinary cause for Crane's death, but the rest of us felt that he would not have died so soon if he had not been ridiculed, tortured, degraded and humiliated by Richard Harding Davis who was believed to be jealous of the fame that had come to Crane in a single publication—a fame that had been utterly denied to Davis although he had been writing for more years than Crane had lived. It was envy of the young and rising author that impelled Davis to this far from glorious action—envy and contempt, for Crane was not a "polished" writer, like Davis, whose journalistic "style" had recommended him to employers willing to pay him a "princely salary" for his froth and fury and the light and lively "pieces" he was able to produce with a turn of the wrist. But Crane, in spite of the handicap of a poor education and no opportunity "in journalism" had accomplished what had been impossible for Davis with all his natural and acquired "facility of expression." That was why Crane was Davis's "enemy." That is why Davis "pilloried" this enemy. And I am only wondering now whether this late acknowledgment of the wrong he did to poor Crane is the outcome of vanity or remorse.

"Say, [illegible] don't you get punished when you're naughty?"
"No—I [illegible] and mama are both lawyers, and they can't [illegible] me!"

Divorce in Japan

The Aoki-Emery incident is virtually closed even for the newspapers, but the reporters will probably "keep an eye" on the "couple" for some time to observe how smoothly the course of true love runs in miscegenation, hoping that "another story" will develop from the "domestic infelicity" of "the ill-mated pair." As a matter of fact it was nobody's business, therefore everybody made it his business. Personally, I am only concerned with a statement which Mrs. Emery is reported to have made regarding the infrequency of divorce in Japan. The mother-in-law of Aoki said that "we never hear of divorce in Japan" and she deduced from this declaration the corollary that the morality of that people was, in consequence, on a higher plane than that of the Americans who are as prone to divorce as the sparks to fly upward. Mrs. Emery has probably been misinformed in this particular by that precious son-in-law of hers who is, no doubt, a liar as brazen as any coolie in Yokohama. Divorce is very common in Japan—more common, in truth, than in any other country; especially among the class from which this Aoki comes. Statistics have been compiled showing that the general proportion of divorces to marriages is nearly as one to three, and in the most favorable years nearly as one to four. The upper classes, however, rarely resort to divorce. Why, indeed, asks an eminent authority, should a man take the trouble to separate from an uncongenial wife, when any wife occupies too inferior a position to be able to make herself a serious nuisance, and when society has no objection to his keeping any number of mistresses? Mrs. Emery should "read up" on the subject of Japan. If she will thus inform herself she will be able to discount many other tales that her precious son-in-law has told her. And when the inevitable happens; when her poor, disillusioned daughter comes weeping to her arms; she will understand much better than she does now how absolutely inferior the Oriental holds the female of his species, and with what contempt he regards a mere wife. I predict that this mother will receive her punishment within six months from date; and that she will acknowledge its justice. I am sincerely sorry, however, for the poor deluded, infatuated girl. Her awakening will be terrible indeed, and her regret will follow her for life.

Irwin's Fairy Tales

For Eastern consumption, the graft prosecution is now printing in various publications detached episodes of the litigation now in progress in this city. It is not necessary to say that the articles are distorted to suit the purposes of the prosecution; that they are gangrened with falsehood; that they are noisomely eulogistic of Spreckels, Heney and Burns; and that they are fetid with prejudice against the defense. The "data" for these "stories" is usually furnished by William J. Burns; but a recent contribution to the American Magazine, under the signature of a hack writer named Will Irwin, is probably based on "information" from Ernest S. Simpson of the San Francisco Call, "corroborated" probably by Fremont Older, managing editor of the San Francisco Bulletin. The Irwin article purports to be "true stories of plots, abductions, dynamiting and attempted murder that have been undertaken against those concerned as witnesses, lawyers, or supporters of the San Francisco graft prosecution." Realizing, perhaps, that these fairy tales carry a heavy weight of improbability by reason of their lop-sided pro-prosecution animus, the editor of the magazine has taken the precaution to prefix an explanatory note announcing that "the condensations and omissions have been made on account of space, and for other good reasons." The "other good reasons" are chiefly concerned with the inability of the "compilers" of these memoirs to tell the whole truth. It is not the intention of the prosecution to let the people of the Eastern States know that the other side of the story is not only a complete and convincing contradiction of the stuff they are printing in the newspapers and magazines, but that back of the whole miserable business is another story of greed, graft, avarice, revenge and personal animosity originally inspired by the sordid purposes of hypocritical civic patriots.

Plots That Were Foiled

In this article Irwin only recites the exploded romances of the "proposed abduction" of Abe Ruef; the "proposed" trapping of former Supervisor Lonergan who was to be accused of criminally assaulting a woman for the purpose of a subsequent expose in the Examiner (a story specially furnished by Fremont Older, whose mind and record runs to this sort of thing, and whose hatred of the Examiner induced him to give Irwin this morsel of "news" regarding the complicity of that newspaper in the "plot"); the "abduction" of Fremont Older (furnished by Older himself); the dynamiting of the Gallagher house; the shooting of Heney by Haas; and the subsequent suicide of Haas. The story of the "proposed abduction" of Ruef is the old Burns "frameup" of Burns with which we are all familiar; the Lonergan story is another of the Burns romances; the "abduction" of Fremont Older is treated in all seriousness, although the laughter evoked by that ridiculous episode has not yet died away in San Francisco; the dynamiting of the Gallagher house is made to appear as the direct outcome of a plot hatched by the officials of the United Railroads; the shooting of Heney was another plot; and finally Haas was murdered in his cell to prevent him from implicating the officials of the corporation in the attempted assassination of the special prosecutor. Irwin has not done his work well, but he must not be criticized for that—he has only the material furnished by Ernest S. Simpson, his intimate friend, and by Fremont Older, the editor of the Boughten Bulletin.

Among the "omissions" mentioned by the editor of the magazine, "made for other good reasons," are the following: The midnight meeting between Rudolph Spreckels and "Big" Jim Gallagher at the Presidio to arrange on a government reservation a matter of immunity and testimony that could not be legally conducted within the jurisdiction of the State of California; the employment of the camera for the coercion and intimidation of a woman; the Biggy tragedy and the part played in it by Burns, Older and Simpson; the story of Ruef's immunity and how the prosecution subsequently "went back" on their contract"; the active participation of Judge Lawlor and Judge Dunne in the plots of the prosecution; the compounding of the felonies of the supervisors by the granting of wholesale immunity on the presumption that their testimony would furnish "circumstantial evidence" of the guilt of the "higher ups"; the organization of a spy system by the prosecution, the chief design of which was to "approach" and intimidate jurors summoned to try the various cases; and the injury that the practices and methods of the prosecution have inflicted on the business of the community. Nothing of all this is even hinted in the Irwin article. Neither is anything said about the Appellate Court decision in the Schmitz case, nor the verdicts of acquittal in the Tirey L. Ford cases. Much is said about Francis J. Heney, including the usual defense of the killing of Dr. Handy, rehashed from the defense written by Muckraker Lincoln J. Steffens under dictation of Heney himself; but nothing is mentioned of Heney's previous condition of servitude to the Contra Costa Water Company and his $45,000 fee, $30,000 of which was paid to him without a voucher of service. Neither is the biography of the special prosecutor brought up to date by recital of the fact that he is still drawing pay from the contingent fund of the Federal Department of Justice for prosecuting land grabbers, while posing in the columns of the Bulletin as a poor man exhausting the few remaining dollars of a meager fortune in "the cause of civic purity." Even if the Irwin article were "true as far as it goes" instead of being a tissue of falsehood and misrepresentation from start to finish, it is incomplete. It attempts to show that the prosecution is being subjected to a merciless persecution at the hands of ruthless and unscrupulous corporations (among which the Southern Pacific railroad is conspicuous); that the "cause of reform" is being assassinated in San Francisco; and that the only hope for the city is in a perpetual suzerainty by Rudolph Spreckels assisted in such administration by William J. Burns, Francis J. Heney, James D. Phelan and Fremont Older—those immaculate patriots, whose purity of motive and impeccant civism has won for them the admiration, affection and reverence of their fellow citizens. The magazine probably paid Irwin as much as $50 for the article; how much it may be worth to Spreckels and the graft prosecution is yet to be determined.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks

For several weeks I have been predicting a change in Wall Street securities for the better. By the action of the market during the past week my predictions have been verified. For nearly three months Wall Street has suffered from depressing influences, yet values did not go to smash. As usual the man with the basket was there gathering all the bargains that happened his way. The tariff, threatened war in Europe, the Hill-Harriman feud, and numerous other disturbing influences had only temporary effect. The real facts are now becoming known. The large market factors sold out around top prices and were in a position to look on until their former holdings could be replaced at a very good profit. It is hardly worth while to specialize. The market gives every indication of shaping itself for a runaway bull movement. The wave will be carried too far but that will only affect the eleventh hour bulls. They are always in evidence at the top.

The upward movement will run its course during the coming two months and be followed by the regular summer dullness. Buying good stocks on recessions of two to three points will prove good judgment for the present.

The United Steel Corporation, since its organization, has spent $225,497,980 for new construction, and $92,534,952 for extraordinary replacements and betterments, a total of $348,032,932. This total is equivalent to $68.50 on the $508,302,932 of common stock outstanding. The amount spent for new construction and extraordinary replacements, in fact, exceeds the present market value of the common stock by approximately $120,000,000.

Volume of trade in the wheat pit the past week has been on a much larger scale than the previous week and prices have advanced every day. The bulls after receiving a slight set back March 8th by the Government figures on the farm reserves, which were estimated at 143 million, were inclined to let the market take its own course. If there was so much wheat left in farmers' hands March 1st, with good weather for marketing and high prices being paid, it was reasonable to expect greater impetus to the movement. On the contrary, however, receipts the past week have been in some instances less than last year, a circumstance that has converted a good many of the conservative trade to the belief that after all, the report given out by a private statistician, which came out prior to the Government figures and was much less than the Government estimate, is perhaps more conservative. The leading bull interest is still talking much higher prices for the May option, and on any signs of weakness immediately supports the market, and when shorts try to cover they have to bid the market up to get their wheat back. Though cash demand has been at times a little slow, prices are at such a big premium over the May option that a setback of a few cents would be welcomed by the bulls and would stimulate a little export trade. The foreign markets, too, have shown signs of awakening and continental markets have advanced much faster than our markets and although we are still a little out of line for export trade, it is only a question of time when Europe must have our wheat. Foreign crop reports are discouraging, especially those from Germany and France. The latter country is making inquiries now for our wheat; add to this the poor outlook for our growing crop, which at its best, promises to be a small one and you have a very bullish situation.

Cotton Letter

Mill takings this week were again surprisingly large; 254,000 bales, against 250,00 last year and 225,000 in 1907. The world's visible supply showed a decrease for the week of 140,000 bales, compared with a decrease of 81,111 bales same week last year and a decrease of only 8,000 bales in 1907. The into-sight-movement was also a distinctly bullish statement, only 150,000 bales having come into sight the past week, against 154,000 last year and 208,000 in 1907. The market is about one dollar per bale higher than the low prices of last week and is in a position to respond to normal influences, and as we see conditions, they should make for higher prices. While Texas has had some rains, they have by no means been general or heavy. The Southern and Eastern portions have been practically neglected, and in other parts of the State where rains did fall they have only helped surface conditions temporarily, and by no means made up for the deficiency of Winter rainfall that is held in the sub-soil and is relied upon to furnish moisture during the drought season. Much is being said about the use of fertilizer, but such contention is not substantiated, as the decline in fertilizer prices is mainly attributed by the manufacturers to slack demand. The factory and the merchant are not supplying the cash that they formerly advanced in Arkansas, Louisiana and Mississippi; and reliable advices from the Atlantic States say fertilizer sales are off 15 to 20 per cent, and much already put in the ground has been lost in recent downpours. We are most reliably informed that Lancashire mill stocks are smaller today than they have been in over ten years; also that their consumption will be a record, and that in view of these facts the mills are purposely placing the worst possible phase on trade conditions in the hope of recouping their small selling margin on the raw material. One of the largest cotton exporters in this country writes us under date of March 16th as follows: "The remnant of the crop is being held tenaciously for much higher prices than a parity with New York, Bremen or Liverpool. This we believe is on account of the better demand for the home mills this year which has established and maintained higher prices than could be afforded by foreign mills." With a settlement of tariff schedules and a conservative administration assured, we expect soon to see trade activity greatly accelerated and old depressing conditions forgotten. Cotton should be the first commodity to respond to improved conditions, being the most generally used and relatively nearest the cost of production.

Stetson Gave a Dinner

The home of J. B. Stetson on Van Ness avenue was the scene of a joyous function last Saturday night. It was a banquet and Mr. Stetson was the host. It is worth recording that Mr. Stetson gave his guests a sumptuous spread, omitting neither soup nor nuts. This is worth recording because when Mr. Stetson was sued for divorce about two years ago his wife alleged that he objected to having soup, salad and pie at one meal. So many luxuries at one sitting he regarded as a wild and unpardonable extravagance. Mr. Stetson's wife, it will be remembered, was the wealthy Doe widow. She obtained her divorce and with her little daughter, the offspring of her first marriage, she started on a tour of the world. Since her departure the news has reached her friends in this city that she was entertained abroad by Chauncey Winslow who was at one time and for some years Mr. Stetson's son-in-law. Mr. Winslow and Mr. Stetson's daughter were divorced not long ago and Mr. Winslow has another wife. But to return to the Stetson dinner: it was a brilliant stag affair. The guests were Judge Harrison, Senator Felton, Judge Cooper, State Senator Stetson, F. M. (Borax) Smith, A. C. Hellmann, Henry Payot, T. C. Van Ness, C. B. Russell, Charles Stetson Wheeler, Herman Schussler, Captain John Bermingham and A. Schilling.

MRS. WALTER SCOTT MARTIN

The Callaghans Reunited and Happy

Since the daily papers published the news, some six months ago, that the Daniel Callaghans were divorced, practically nothing has been heard of the movements of either party. Their marriage took place in British Columbia five years ago, and it was a social event of importance when Miss Viola Carey, daughter of Captain Carey of the Empress line of steamers running between this coast and the Orient were united. They came to this city and made their home at the Colonial, and it was there that the first of their conjugal difficulties arose. Seemingly their affairs were running satisfactorily enough when presently the gossips conceived that Mrs. Callaghan was not as happy as a young wife should be. They said that she was neglected. Whispers were set afloat then, and there was some talk of a separation, but the rumors were hushed and the atmosphere cleared. It was said at that time that the Callaghan family sympathized with the wife and promised her their support if matters ever came to a climax. From time to time thereafter vague hints of uncongeniality were afloat, but as the relatives on neither side gave confirmation to them, the Callaghans and their domestic affairs were given a rest. After the earthquake Daniel Callaghan established his wife and their two little children in an attractive bungalow at Palo Alto, where his sisters also have their home. A coldness had come between them and their sister-in-law, however, and I understand that not even the courtesy of a formal bow was exchanged when they met. Left to her own devices, and with time heavy on her hands during the frequent absence of her husband, Mrs. Callaghan began to inject interest into her life. Society was startled when she instituted proceedings for divorce on the ground of cruelty, and relieved when she withdrew her application almost immediately. The next news of importance was conveyed through the medium of the public press when, not three months after the abandonment of Mrs. Callagahan's suit it was announced that he had been granted a separation with the custody of the two children. The story was a decided shock to all who knew them. Mrs. Callaghan went to Los Angeles to live and Mr. Callaghan took up his residence in Menlo with the two children. With the granting of the interlocutory decree the troubles of the Callaghans as a family were presumed to be at an end. They were assumed to be living as far apart as was practicable, and the cementing of the broken ties was the last thing thought of. But now comes the final chapter, or perhaps it is only the first chapter of the sequel volume, for it has just become known that the Callaghans are living together again in all amity. How, when or why the reunion was brought about no one appears to know, but despite the intense family opposition and the experience of the past they have mutually agreed to ignore what has been. When the Callaghan estate is settled Daniel will be wealthy in his own right, but at present I believe that it is involved, and meanwhile the eldest sister holds the purse strings and holds them tight. It is said that with a view to preventing a reconciliation she threatened to cut off her brother's allowance entirely, and finding that he was inclined to disregard her warnings, she has adhered to her word, and he is now absolutely dependent on his own exertions for support. The Callaghans are living very quietly at Lebanon, Oregon, where the eldest brother, William, has a paper mill, and present indications are that the final decree of divorce will never be asked for. Mrs. Callaghan's friends say it was all a mistake. Evidently Mr. Callaghan is of the same opinion, and I hear that the second voyage on the matrimonial high seas promises to be more fortunate than the first venture.

She Had the Courage of Her Wig

The death of Miss Carrie Gwin will again plunge several prominent families into mourning and necessitate their absence from the social whirl. Amongst them will be Mrs. James Follis, formerly Miss Mary Belle Gwin, who will be missed from the gaieties both here and in San Rafael. Miss Gwin belonged to the old-time southern set, so noted for charity and hospitality. The Gwin home on Rincon Hill, where the late Senator and Mrs. Gwin, Mrs. Evan J. Coleman and Miss Carrie Gwin entertained and where senators, diplomats and noted travelers from all parts of the world were guests of honor is one of the traditions of San Francisco. Mrs. Gwin was opposed to shams and pretences of all kinds, and there is a story often told by Miss Carrie Gwin, which illustrates the early and deep-seated dislike of her mother to even justifiable deceptions. It seems that when Mrs. Gwin was a very young girl she was unfortunate enough to be bereft of her hair and obliged to wear a wig. The circumstance was annoying enough to one of her temperament, but became an additional aggravation when she became engaged to Dr. Gwin. It worried her only the more that he should so ardently admire her luxurious curly hair, and she determined that the only honorable course for her to pursue would be to confess the deceit before the wedding day. So, on one occasion when the doctor called she excused herself from the room, and after an absence of a few moments she returned and stood before the horrified young man with a head perfectly bald. He jumped to his feet exclaiming, "My, what has happened!" to which she made answer: "Nothing; only I wear a wig," holding it up for inspection, "and I wanted you to know it before we were married."

THE SACKVILLE PEERAGE ROMANCE: PEOPLE WHOSE NAMES ARE FIGURING IN THE GREAT CASE AT MADRID

A remarkable contest involving a title is now in progress in Madrid. Three men are accused of having altered church records. With regard to the succession, it should be said that the second Baron Sackville lived for some years in marital relationship with the Spanish dancer, Josefa Pepita Duran. By her he had several children, and these he declared legitimate. When he died last year, his nephew, Mr. Lionel Edward Sackville-West, claimed the right to the title, in virtue of a contract which, it is said, proves that Josefa Duran was married to a dancing-master, Antonio de la Oliva, and that consequently her children by Lord Sackville are debarred from the succession. Mr. Ernest Sackvelle-West claims the title as eldest son of the late Lord Sackville and the Spanish dancer, and argues that the contract referred to is not genuine. The genuineness or the falsity of this certificate must be decided before the case can be tried as a general action in England.

A Bad Loser

Bridge is the one special diversion that has kept society from nodding during the forty days. There have been daily gathering of congenial souls devoted to bridge or scat, and while prizes have been supplied usually, it is no secret that stakes have added interest, and rather high stakes at that. The former half-cent a point has been raised to a full cent in most of the little cliques, and after several hours of steady application, gains or losses may amount to a pretty penny before the refreshments are served. At one of the recent parties an attractive matron who had suffered a run of bad luck took no pains to conceal her disappointment. It is told that when the score was completed her afternoon's strenuous work left her several dollars to the bad, and to the surprise of the other guests, and of her victorious opponent in particular, who always accepts the freaks of fortune philosophically, she petulantly hurled the entire pack of cards with full force against the opposite wall. In recounting the story some one afterward recalled that this same matron, though an excellent player, never does take a loss calmly, and that only a few months ago she created a scene at a gathering in San Mateo. The stakes were exceptionally high, and after a run of good luck, she began to lose heavily, more heavily, in fact, than her purse would stand, so she went whimpering to her hostess and sobbed out that she would be unable to pay. The others were surprised at this outburst, for the lady in question had always pocketed her winnings so jauntily that it never occurred to them she would not accept defeat gracefully. However, she still continued to attend bridge clubs and parties, and has managed to conceal her chagrin and disappointment fairly well until this last outbreak, when the scattered cards gave evidence of the state of her temper, and caused a judicious withdrawal of her friends until the atmosphere cleared somewhat.

Dancing With the Polloi

There is an air of rejoicing amongst society people, now that the Lenten season is drawing to a close, though it is generally conceded that this has been the gayest penitential period San Francisco has ever seen. Luncheons, dinners, theater parties and subsequent big suppers have been the rule rather than the exception, and every day there has been found excuse for some informal gathering of friends. However, except for the fortnightly hops at the Presidio, there has been no dancing, and some of those devoted to that form of diversion have found a solution to their problem of how to indulge themselves which is, to say the least, unconventional. Some of the society leaders are frankly horrified, and others openly express their approval, while there is room for every shade of opinion between these extremes. Despite the gay winter with its succession of balls, there were many of the younger set of the social elect who regretted the dawn of Ash Wednesday morning which put the quietus to their diversion. Out on Fillmore street, near Sutter, there is a public dance hall, where whenever the spirit moves them, a dozen of the wealthiest and more sought after maidens of the exclusive inner circle assemble, accompanied by as many men of their own set, who pay the popular price of "a nickel a dance" and proceed to enjoy themselves. They say it beguiles their weary hours and is "loads of fun," and while they admit that the society is somewhat mixed, they defend it as no worse than the skating rink or Sutro's baths. At either place there may be objectionable persons, but if one takes one's own party and confines one's self to its limits, there is no danger of promiscuity. The chaperons, however, have not been conciliated. Most of them are genuinely scandalized, and the prohibitions of those mothers who have withheld their consent are of the sternest. The men, of course, regard the whole thing as a great lark, and the girls are even more enthusiastic, for it appeals to their imagination as a "jag." They flatter themselves that they have now crossed the boundaries of Bohemia, and the little Fillmore street "nickel dance" is in their eyes but a minor edition of the famous—or infamous Moulin Rouge. But the stir which the escapades have created is not dying down. The matrons who frown on the dances and their participants are just the ones who guard the portals of society, and since their advice and warnings have been unheeded, it is just possible that they may be heard from later on. A word to the wise is sufficient.

Other Days, Other Manners

Some of the elder matrons of society were recently discussing the present day freedom of the press as compared to the restraints demanded in former times when one of them, the wife of a prominent judge, related an incident as an illustration of the point. A brilliant ball had taken place, and on the next morning a daily paper published an account of the function. Among those whose gowns were described was Mrs. J. C. McKinstry, the wife of a distinguished jurist. The husband made it his business to meet the editor of the paper and horsewhip him in Union Square for taking such unwarranted liberty with a member of his household. One of the listeners remarked that today an editor is in far greater danger of chastisement if he neglects to mention a guest or to describe her costume.

Death of an Old Californian

The news of the death of Colonel George F. E. Harrison at Fortress Monroe, Virginia, came as a shock to this community on Sunday last. Colonel Harrison was a Californian who was held in high esteem by all who knew him. He bore the distinction of being the first native born Californian to receive an appointment to the West Point Military Academy, in 1869, and during the whole period of his army experience his record was without a flaw. He was in the office of the Chief of Artillery for a long time, and from 1886 to 1890 he served as instructor of military science and tactics at the University of California. At the time of his death he was commandant of Fortress Monroe. Colonel Harrison was the son of the late James and Isabella Harrison, who were among the early settlers in California. He married Miss Mamie Ray, who was a prominent belle in the social circles of Washington, D. C., in the early 80's, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ross Ray. Besides his widow he has left an interesting family of six sons and one daughter.

Death of Mrs. Hooker

The numerous friends of Mrs. Charles G. Hooker were shocked to learn of her death from pneumonia on Monday evening last. She had been ill but a few days, and a fatal termination was not looked for. Mrs. Hooker was the widow of the late Charles G. Hooker and mother of Osgood Hooker who married Miss Ella Goad and Robert Hooker whose wife was Miss Bessie Shreve. Mrs. George Lent and Bessie Hooker were her daughters. Since the fire which destroyed the old home on Bush street, Mrs. Hooker and Miss Bessie have lived in apartments at the Lafayette on Sacramento street, and they had just completed arrangements to move. Mr. and Mrs. George Lent are traveling abroad.

Golf at Del Monte

The golf links at Del Monte are becoming a Mecca for the devotees of that sport, for there are both men and women who come to California annually to play for a few weeks, where they are sure to find themselves in contests against opponents whose skill makes it a pleasure to play in their company. The Del Monte links possess many advantages, both natural and planned. There is no other hotel which has its grounds so near the house and at the same time so apparently secluded. A five-minute walk through a sylvan lane takes one to the course, a beautiful park-like forest of a hundred and twenty-six acres, with a full regulation eighteen-hole course, affording a walk of over a mile. If present plans are carried out these grounds will be the scene of an interesting contest within a month or two. The annual September tournament has become a feature of such prominence that it has become almost necessary to hold another some time during the year,

Juvenile Genius

Over in San Rafael they are pointing with pride to the promise foreshadowed in two of the youngsters and predicting great things for the future. And small wonder, for these two youths, the son of Dr. Howitt, aged fifteen, and his companion, the scion of the Frederick Paxton Howards, a year or two younger, have taken a novel departure for these days. Instead of going in for sport or rowdyism, they have turned their attention to scientific pursuits. Without outside aid they have rigged up a wireless telegraph station which is not only an artistic construction, but in perfect working order. They can send and receive messages, and are anticipating the perfecting of a complete scheme of their own in a short time. Both lads have fathers able and willing to indulge them to a reasonable extent, and they have no end of plans to work out. People in general are taking quite an interest in the boys and predict that such enterprise at fifteen must prefigure genius at thirty, and are giving them every kind of encouragement to persevere.

In the Social Spotlight

Miss Innes Keeney will leave soon for Louisville, Kentucky, going thence to St. Louis, after which she will be a guest of her sister, Ethel, now Mrs. Tomlinson, in New York. Miss Keeney, being in mourning, has not participated in late social affairs and she has been greatly missed. Her trip will be extended to the late fall.

Miss Elizabeth and Miss Marion Newhall will visit San Jose this week as guests of Mrs. Seymour Waterhouse, after which they will all proceed to Los Gatos by automobile to witness the Floral Fete.

Late letters from Mrs. Walter E. Hedges report her safe arrival in Nice, where she has joined Miss Helen Robson. On April 15th they will start for Italy and later they will visit Spain.

Miss Harriet Borden, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ivy L. Borden, has undergone an operation for appendicitis, from which she is reported to be recovering rapidly. Miss Borden is a very young girl, and although she has not yet made her formal social debut, her engagement to Paymaster Collins, U. S. N., is known to her intimate friends. The wedding will take place this summer. She is a grand daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. R. R. Thompson, by whose death her mother was made the heiress of a great fortune, for Mr. Thompson left about eight millions. Mr. Borden is of Southern origin, coming from a distinguished family. The late Judge Rhodes was his brother and the late Judge Garber was of the same connection.

Mrs. William Grattan of St. Helena has been visiting Mrs. Bourne at her home on Webster street. She will return to St. Helena this week.

Miss Linda Cadwalader was hostess at an informal tea last Friday at her home on Devisadero street. Mrs. George Cadwalader leaves on Saturday, April 3, for New York.

Mr. and Mrs. H. Clay Miller Jr., have opened their attractive country home at Sausalito for the summer. Mrs. H. Clay Miller Sr., has gone to Santa Barbara, where she will spend the next few months.

Mrs. Jerome B. Landfield, the Russian princess, who has been seriously ill at an Oakland sanitarium, is now convalescent and has returned to her apartments at the Hotel Carlton, Berkeley.

Dame Rumor is busy with conjectures regarding a certain Titian-haired maid who resides in one of the fashionable houses on California street and the son of one of our well-known merchants. If bouquets, trips to the theater and constant devotion are indications there will shortly be another engagement announced.

Mrs. Paul Beck, wife of Captain Beck, U. S. N., was hostess at a bridge party recently at her attractive quarters at the Presidio.

Miss Helen Irwin will soon leave for the East with her mother to spend the greater part of the summer, with possibly a trip to Europe before they return to California.

The tea given by Captain and Mrs. Henry T. Ferguson, U. S. N., on Sunday afternoon at Fort Miley, in honor of Miss Bessie Harrison Bane, U. S. N., has just been announced, was a large and brilliant affair attended by the army officers from the Presidio and other bay points, with their wives, as well as a good sprinkling of civilians from the city.

Mr. F. M. Dick and his son, Mr. J. J. Dick, are stopping at the St. Francis. Mr. Dick Jr. is the youngest member of the New York Stock Exchange, being now but twenty-two years of age, yet it is some time since he paid his $75,000 for a seat.

Overheard on a Street Car

Scene—Ellis Street Car.

Characters: Queenie—A chorus lady with $9.00 worth of hair, her best matinee eyebrows and other charms. Hanging on strap.

Winnie—A real blonde, also of the "profession."

Ned Gilmore—An actor.

Rabble—Composed of the very first citizens of San Francisco, sitting or blocking entrances to car.

Queenie—Hello! Win—How're they coming?

Winnie—Sorta rough, believe me. Didn't yuh see them boobs a blockin' the way, an' nickin' my new suede kicks? I never see the like for handlin' coarse to a lady as they do in San Francisco. Yuh gotta be an acrobat to get in a car, 'cause they gum up the entrance so, an' when yuh do make it, they rub it in by makin' yuh swing on the leather. Honest to Gawd, Kid, their company manners was all shook out by that Earthquake of recent momeory.

"Oh heavenings" (staring at man sitting) some ojus Native Son has been eatin' onions.

Say Queenie, has any of them Native Sons cooed yuh about them happy days before the fire? Ain't it turrible the way yuh sit down to the linen expectin' the big eats, and the French Excitement Water, an' yuh get steam beer, and horse radish trimmed with a post mortem of them good ole times before the fire. Yuh're only excitement is the fear of starvin'. I'm gettin' wise to the game now—I'm the Champ for the suppression of the before-the-fire bull. When I see the vapoury stuff comin' I throw on the emergency an' inform 'em that the fire is over, an' to help rebuild the city by scattering some change. The sweepers need it.

Where you livin' now, girlie?

Queenie—With a private family, an' it's a rum dump, I'm tellin' yuh. No one but the collectors or smallpox ever goes there. I can't bring nobody to call on me, because the landlady's cake-faced cherub child has the parlor engaged by the year. Every time I look in there I get the standin'-room-only sign flashed at me. I guess the only time I'll ever get the parlor is when I'm lyin' in state with 'at rest' worked in flowers over my head.

Oh, but what's the use of kickin'. Them's lovely curls of your'n. They become you wonderful.

Winnie—(Demurely toying the ringlets) Honest to Gawd, Kid, are they sure becomin'? Well, me for $3.00 worth more. I think I can carry the weight. But say, who was that swell pomadoured gent that was keepin' you company at the Bismarck?

Queenie—That's one good Kid, I'm tellin' yuh. He's there a thousand with the coin. He was still goin' to Sunday school when the big fire was pulled off, so yuh get none of that before-the-fire comedy. It's kangaroo steaks an' Bubbles when yuh sit down to the Lunch with him. He's one them Rah-Rahs from Berkeley. Like all college kids, he's soft under the Stetson, sorta splashes up occasionally, an' doesn't carry any overweight in Grey matter. But I'm trainin' him for the chorus girls' Marathon.

Winnie—Look who's boardin'. Wouldn't that crack

The tastes of some people. Mercy Percy, the tall duke on stilts with her, brush by—brush by.

Would yuh put yuh're heart in pawn for his ring?

Queenie—what? Fall for that—not for a bunch of Daisies and a million, an' yuh know I'm mercenary. I make no bones about it. Before I'd put my ruby lips to his'en, I'd land on his dial like Jefferies goin' to the dinge.

Winnie—Say, who do you think I saw in San Jose when we were playin' there. Why, Gertie Tillson, yuh know with the gold teeth. The simple life down there with the cows an' alfalfy doesn't agree with her, although she has a swell house, a whole routine of servants and a healthy side-board. Married and miserable like the rest of the girls who leave the Profession. While I was there, they had one of them advance guards of divorce—a quiet family four round go. I'm expectin' to see her blow in here any day, askin' for her ole job, 'cause 'the Call of the Wild' is beating' pretty hard under her Physche knot.

Queenie—Oh see the funeral, with a band a playin' a lovely dead march. That's a kinda procession I want.

Winnie—Cut out the gloomy talk. Let's beat it to 'Sherry's' and spear a few cherries, kinda get in condition for the 30-minute fight with the eats, it's the only place in 'Frisco where they get the ole New York scald to a Bronx cocktail.

Oh, here's Ned Gilmore. He's playing' stock.

Hello, Ned—Miss Faye this is Mr. Gilmore.

Ned—An' awful party last night, girls. I was hamman-bathed back to life this morning an' was absintne-frapped into the goin' again this afternoon, so won't you join me in a little drink. Does it listen well?

Feminine Chorus—I guess it do.

The Garrick Theater

Manager Will Greenbaum has some great offerings in store for April and May. On April 20 he will open the Garrick Theater, the finest building ever devoted to music and kindred matters in San Francisco. It is the auditorium now known as the Orpheum, at Ellis and Fillmore streets, and is a first-class building, with perfect acoustic properties, and an ideal place for concerts, lectures, and high-class theatrical performances. The opening attraction will be Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist who, at the early age of eighteen, is admitted to be not a prodigy, but a master of the instrument. Then will come Dr. Ludwig Wullner, the song interpreter who, with his marvellous accompanist, Conrad V. Bos, is the great sensation of the musical season in the vocal line, as Elman is in the instrumental. After that there will be a series of Shakespearean productions with music, by Ben Greet Players, numbering over thirty, in conjunction with the famous Russian Symphony Orchestra of New York. Over one hundred and twenty people are necessary to these productions, and apart from the grand opera companies, it is the largest organization that has ever visited us. Commencing April 29, Mr. Greenbaum will also present at Christian Science hall three courses of Burton Holmes' "Travalogues," the subjects being Berlin, London, Paris, Vienna and Fez. And these are only some, for he says there are more good things coming.

Carle at the Van Ness

In the eloquent language of the press agent "Mary's Lamb" at the Van Ness "is a scream" and Richard Carle is "the goods." This ebullient comedian is one of the most magnetic personalities on the stage. He is a stranger to San Francisco not because he only recently emerged from the nebular state but because this lighthearted city is in the provinces. He has been ministering to the risibles of the East for years, and he stands at the head of his class. Like George Cohen he supplies his own material. "Mary's Lamb" is a concoction of nonsense contrived by Carle, and it has all the elements that make for briskness and breeziness. Mr. Carle has surrounded himself with a clever lot of mimes, and he gives us one of the best performances of the kind that has been seen at the Van Ness in many a day. He will be followed at the Van Ness by Otis Skinner in a dramatization of Balzac's "Menage de Garcon," called "The Honor of the Family." Mr. Skinner will open his engagement Monday, April 15th.

Admiral Robley D. Evans' Lectures

There are very few, if any, Americans, who do not know something concerning the career of Robley D. Evans of the United States Navy, "Fighting Bob," as he is affectionately and popularly called, and his forty and more years of continuous service, during which he took part in two wars and most of the big spectacular events of the peace years. When he retired from active service, after his memorable cruise with the biggest fleet that ever sailed, he was approached by a New York syndicate and asked to give a series of lectures telling of his career. His fame as an after dinner speaker was well known, too, and he was tempted into this publicity by the highest fee ever offered to any lecturer since Robert G. Ingersol. He accepted the offer, and the enterprising Greenbaum wired immediately, offering to buy three of the appearances for this vicinity. The result is that San Francisco will have the opportunity of hearing Evans twice. The lectures in this city will be given in Dreamland Rink, which, besides its perfect acoustics, will accommodate a large audience. The first, on Wednesday night, April 14, will be on the subject of "From Hampton Roads to San Francisco With the Fleet," and the second, on Sunday afternoon, April 18, on "The War With Spain." Applications for seats are coming in so rapidly that Mr. Greenbaum has arranged for a preliminary mail order sale. Not more than ten seats will be sold to any one person, for in the East speculators grabbed most of the seats and fleeced the public and it is determined that the same thing shall not happen here. Season tickets, admitting to both lectures, will be $3, $2.50 and $1.50. Single lectures, $2, $1.50 and $1. Orders must be accompanied by check or money order and made payable to Will L. Greenbaum, at Sherman Clay & Co.'s, corner Sutter and Kearny streets. In Oakland Admiral Evans will lecture on "The Voyage of the Fleet" at Ye Liberty Playhouse on Monday night, April 19. Manager H. W. Bishop has agreed to lay off his entire stock company on that night so that the citizens of Alameda County may pay their tribute to the hero. Seats for this occasion may be ordered now from Manager H. W. Bishop, Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland. As there is not a man, woman or child who is not anxious to hear Admiral Evans' stories if they can possibly manage it, an early reservation of seats is important. The public sale will open on Monday morning, April 12.

The Princess

The Princess has scored another great hit with the witty and tuneful musical comedy, "Nancy Brown," which is proving the best vehicle the company at this theatre has yet had. Frank Moulan as the much worried Persian Bey convulses his audiences with laughter while Fred Mace makes a great and distinct comedy success as the drummer. May Boley fairly revels in the character of Nancy Brown which could not suit her better had it been specially written for her. Ethel Du Fre Houston's first musical chance comes with this piece and enables her to establish herself as a vocalist of ability. She is the possessor of a rich and fine dramatic contralto and the one number which falls to her share enables her to win several enthusiastic encores. James F. Stevens is in pleasant musical evidence as the Prince and the lesser roles are admirably sustained. The scenery and costumes are Orientally beautiful and do full justice to the charms of the many beautiful girls who take part in this production. In consequence of its success "Nancy Brown" will be continued another week. It will be successed by another New York Musical Comedy hit called "The Umpire," which will introduce Fred Mace in the name part which he originated.

"Are You a Mason"

Ever since "Are You a Mason" attained its celebrity as a mirth-maker the Alcazar management has utilized it for the last week of Lent, and this year there will be no exception to the rule. The famous farce is announced for next Monday evening. Nothing funnier was ever written for the stage than "Are You a Mason." Although it was adapted from the German, and incidentally made a fortune for its translator, Leo Ditrichstein, it provokes more American laughs than any of the purely native fun-makers. It packed the old Alcazar Theatre to the doors the night before the memorable April 18th, and it did the same thing during its run last spring in the Sutter street house. That it will be witnessed by crowded audiences at every performance next week is a foregone conclusion. There will be little or no change in the cast from that which gave the farce such excellent treatment a year ago. You will again see Bertram Lytell as the young benedict who gets himself and other folk into all kinds of ridiculous situations by pretending he is a Mason. Ernest Glendinning will again be seen as the accommodating youth who obliges his friend by masquerading as a modiste, and has much fun and several mishaps; John B. Maher will, as usual, make the most of the man from Illinois, who for twenty years has falsely led his confiding wife to believe that his nights were spent in a Masonic lodge instead of less reputable places. Burt Wesner as the "rube," who is put to all kinds of severe physical and mental tests to prove that he is eligible to become a Mason.

Ossip Gabrielowitsch, "Poet of the Piano"

The second of the Gabrielowitsch concerts will be given this Sunday afternoon, April 4, at Christian Science hall, when the artist will introduce to our music lovers a new composition by a young American composer, Daniel Gregory Mason of New York. The work is quite a big one and is called "Elegy in Variation Form." Wherever it has been played it has met with the highest praise from critics, and is welcomed as a valuable addition to pianoforte literature. Beethoven's "Sonata," Op. 31, a group of Chopin works and numbers by Arensky, Liszt and Moskowski complete the offering. On Tuesday night, April 6, this artist will play what many musicians pronounce the finest program of piano music ever offered in this city. The first number will be Schumann's "Fantasie," Op. 17, one of the most beautiful compositions in the entire repertoire for piano; this will be followed by the two Chopin "Etudes," Op. 25 and Op. 10, and the "Polonaise," Op. 53; then will come by far the most important and beautiful of the compositions of Edward Grieg, the "Ballade in Variation Form," Op. 22. The final group, a most attractive one, includes Dvorak's "Humoresque" with which memories of Fritz Kreisler are so closely associated; "L'Alouette," Glinka-Balakirew; Rubinstein's stunning waltz, "Le Bal," and a "Caprice Burlesque," by Gabrielowitsch, a great and unhackneyed program.

RICHARD CARLE

At the American

Daniel Sully will be seen in his lovable and amusing characterization of Father Daly in the quaint comedy-drama, "The Matchmaker," for the last times this Saturday afternoon and evening. At the Sunday matinee the "Black Patti Troubadours," headed by Sissieretta Jones, the "Black Patti," will begin a week's engagement in their two-act musical comedy, "The Blackville Strollers." This aggregation of sweet singers and ebony colored fun-makers of Dixie land has been recognized for many years as a standard high-class attraction and one that has scored a success with theatregoers in all sections of the country. Among the forty in its rank are to be found the most talented Afro-American singers, dancers and comedians, including Tim Owsley, Billy Young and Will Cooke. Mme. Jones, the Black Patti, the vocal star of the organization and a great favorite in San Francisco where she has sung herself into favor time and again, in addition to being the most gifted singer of her race, enjoys the distinction of having sung before the largest audience that ever assembled in Madison Square Garden, New York City, and the first colored singer, honored by Royal command, to sing before the then Prince of Wales, now King Edward VII. of England. In this country the Black Patti and the Troubadours, through their refined and enjoyable stage performances, have added much to the musical enjoyment of the people. In addition to sweet melodies of the South, reminiscent of anti-bellum days, they have many up-to-date original musical hits.

Garrick's Sweetheart at the Valencia

So great has been the success of Frances Aymar Mathews' delightful comedy drama, "Pretty Peggy," at the Valencia Theatre that the management has decided to continue its presentation for half a week longer, the final performances being announced for Wednesday afternoon and evening. The house will be closed the remainder of the week, reopening at the matinee Easter Sunday with a splendid production of "Peter Pan." There's color and movement a-plenty in "Pretty Peggy." Beginning with the scene in Madame Violanti's circus booth, set up in Fowne's Court, Dublin, with its tumblers and acrobats, students and young gallants, Peg Woffington is introduced with a picturesque dash and swing. Then follows a scene in Rich's room under the stage of the famous old Covent Garden Theatre, where the manager and his guests toast Peg Woffington, the reigning stage favorite, surrounded by the stage properties that the manager has used to furnish his apartment. Following is Peg's own room, with its rich appointments, and where Peg displays her wedding trouseau. Then come the scenes on the stage, and in the auditorium, where Peg's detractors seek to bring her popularity to an end. It is here that the remarkable riot scene occurs with gallants and young dandies, in their Eighteenth Century costumes, running through the house, in pretended disapproval of the French dancers, imported by Rich, but really in an attempt to make

THE IMPORTANCE OF MEN'S APPEARANCE

Sack Suits

The prevailing color this spring and probably for the fall also, in materials for sack suits is grey; plain in pattern or with slender lines and occasionally a plaid or overcheck will creep in. One need however pay little attention to the kind of sack suit material so long as it is good of its kind and intrinsically stylish. The chief mistake men make is in selecting fabrics that look too much like those selected by every one else; in other words, materials that lack character. As to cut of coats avoid exaggerated ideas of any kind, as they are never in good form. Double breasted coats are always in style although not so much in vogue in spring as in fall. Trousers should be cut to fall straight from hip. The waistcoat, without collar, with an opening fairly low closed with five buttons.

Whether one is about to attend some social function or whether one is bent upon an important mission of state or business or whether one is looking for a position, it does not make a particle of difference, one must be dressed well, for the world takes us at first glance for what we appear and it is of the most vital importance to guard the expression of one's apparel as carefully as the expression of the face. The president of a big Eastern industrial company, in one of his addresses at a conference of his salesman, argued the importance of dress in business as follows: "This company pays its men well so that they may be able to properly attire themselves. Everything depends upon the strength of the impression you make upon your prospective purchaser. He will be more ready to listen to your recital if you enter smart looking than otherwise. When you enter a store to purchase an article, the clerk will wait on you quickly and with more attention. When you enter a hotel the porter will grab your bag first and save you annoyance and time which is the equivalent of health and money." This same captain of insustry said: "That if he was looking for a job and had only twenty-five dollars in money, he would spend twenty-four of it for a good suit of clothes, a hair cut and a shave, a clean collar and a good meal." This was his way of emphasizing the importance of appearance. This coming from a man who worked himself up from the ranks from $25.00 per month to his salary of $50,000 per year is certainly worthy of consideration. The shrewd employer is always looking for "ear marks," nothing will escape his attention. He will look one over from head to foot and notice at a glance every detail of dress, appearance and manner, one's carriage, the degree of intelligence and the extent of education. Everything counts in his estimation of you and if he gets a bad impression through careless appearance, he is through with you.

In the Limelight

Madame Alla Nazimova will be seen here this month in a series of her greatest successes. She will be supported by her entire New York company. Five productions are to be offered during the two weeks stay of the great Russian actress.

While "Classmates," in which Norman Hackett will appear at the American Theatre for one week beginning Easter Sunday afternoon, has a college play atmosphere about it, the characters being all youthful, it deals with military life at West Point, with the unusual variety of shifting the scenes to New York City and the jungles of South America before the story is told.

A brand new American play, by two Americans authors, and San Franciscans at that, will be produced for the first time on any stage at the American Theatre Sunday afternoon, April 18th. It is called "Right's Might." It is by the well know actor, Frank McGlynn, and the baseball magnate, Jack Gleason. Those who have been fortunate enough to read the manuscript predict a brilliant career for the play.

Lillian France, one of Broadway's brightest, prettiest and most talented ingenues, arrived from New York Friday, to begin an engagement at the Valencia Theatre as Wendy, in "Peter Pan."

"The Merry Widow" will open on July 4th at the Van Ness Theatre.

Auto Notes

R. E. Bousfield, a retired capitalist who resides on the Tunnel road, Berkeley, recently purchased a Studebaker "30" model "A" touring car which he will use exclusively for pleasure jaunts about the State.

Among the well known automobilists at the hill climb Sunday were Thomas H. Morton, with his Chalmers-Detroit, W. C. Dallas of Merced in his Thomas Flyer, L. L. Burman in his Chalmers-Detroit, W. F. Hunt of San Jose, and party, in a six-cylinder Oldsmobile, T. H. B. Varney and party in a Thomas Flyer, and L. Harrison and party in a six-cylinder Thomas Flyer.

To the top of Buena Vista Heights at the rate of thirty miles an hour is the remarkable feat of a Chalmers-Detroit 30 horsepower car. Charles O'Day of the Pioneer Automobile Company was the operator of the speedy trip. "I had four passengers on the test," said O'Day, "and starting from the Coliseum I turned the engine loose and we went up to the summit in record breaking time, much to the surprise of the prospective purchasers." Buena Vista Heights is well known for its steep and winding grade of over one mile, and the feat of the 30 horsepower car in making the ascent is such fast time is considered remarkable.

Captain Henry Adams, one of the most prominent mining men of Plumas County and one of the keenest judges of automobiles on the coast, having driven cars for the past two years all over the west, recently bought a Studebaker "30" touring car. This is his second Studebaker machine.

A three-ton gasoline motor truck as a farm vehicle in place of the ordinary horse wagon is unusual, to say the least. It is a fact, however, and shows that the rapid substitution of the commercial motor vehicle for horse-drawn conveyance is not by any means limited to our large cities. One good example of the practical use of the motor truck in farming is afforded by Conyers Manor, at Greenwich, Conn., one of the most notable estates in the East, which is not merely ornamental, but a great farm operated on a commercial basis. It represents 1300 acres of reclaimed land and is the home of E. C. Converse. Aside from being a beautiful estate, it is typical of the great advancement which has been made in modern farming, and especially in the way of applying scientific and commercial methods to agriculture. Motor cars are common at Conyers Manor. Not only is there a large and well equipped private garage for the several pleasure cars, but there is a separate garage for commercial vehicles, which it is proposed to use extensively. The basis of work in the commercial vehicle line, now on the farm, is a Packard three-ton truck.

An auto stage line between Muir's mill and Willits, Cal., will be opened on May 15th next, a distance of twelve miles, by the Studebaker E-M-F "30" agent at Fort Bragg, W. H. Ward. Associated with Ward will be Len Barnard. According to Ward, two trips will be made daily, in order to accommodate passengers for both the morning and afternoon trains. Ward has been instrumental in arousing considerable interest in automobiles in his district and lately has made several sales of the popular car for which he is the agent.

According to reports received by the Pioneer Automobile Company the old Thomas Flyer, winner of the New York-to-Paris race which is now being used as a pathfinder for the proposed tour from New York to Seattle, is having a strenuous trip through the snow and mud of the eastern States. The trip across the continent, according to present plan, will take at least thirty days and the champion stock car is not expected to reach Seattle before May 1st.

In taking delivery of his Buick "White Streak" from the Howard Automobile Company last week, Wm. G. Van Zee of Woodland encountered many thrilling experiences. It all came about in this way. The little "White Streak" was shipped, as per order of the purchaser, by boat to Knights Landing, and the trip from that point to Woodland, a distance of ten miles through the flooded districts of the Sacramento Valley, was undertaken by Mr. Van Zee in opposition to the serious advice of every one who knew of his contemplated action. Mr. Van Zee is thoroughly familiar with the capabilities of the little "White Streak" and his confidence in its ability to take him safely through the hazardous if not reckless undertaking, was unshaken. Heedless of the great dangers to which he was subjecting both himself and his little car, Mr. Van Zee steadily and unfalteringly pushed his way through the flood waters and accomplished the seeming impossible task without mishap. The pluck and grit of Mr. Van Zee and the marvelous performance of the little "White Streak" are now the subject of discussion and admiration of all who are familiar with the flooded condition which obtains at the present time in the Sacramento Valley.

One of the most distinct improvements in the 1909 automobiles, especially of the medium priced models, is the use of the unit power plant, that is, the motor and transmission being arranged as a unit. This style of motor construction is used altogether on the best of the foreign cars, such as the Decauville and Motobloc, and is a feature of the American Chalmers-Detroit "30." Some of the advantages noticeable in the unit power system, are the perfect alignment of the transmission and crank shaft, the absence of the universal joint between motor and transmission, and consequent saving of power simplicity of construction, the housing of the flywheel insuring absolute cleanliness, protection of clutch from dirt and the saving of room which permits of the lengthening of the propeller shaft. This permits of an approximately straight line drive without slanting the engine.

it impossible for Pretty Peggy to speak the epilogue of the play of the evening, "As You Like It." A Great Concert for Easter Manager Greenbaum has completed the arrangements for the great Easter Festival Concert and announces a program which, for beauty and interest, could scarcely be excelled in any city of the world. The concert was inspired by the timely visit of Gabrielowitsch, one of the greatest artists the world of music has ever known. This young Russian is famous in Europe for his interpretations of Schumann, Bach and Chopin, and there is nothing more beautiful than the Chopin works for the piano with orchestral accompaniment. It has been many years since we have heard in this city a great artist with orchestra, so Manager Greenbaum evolved the idea of the festival for Easter Sunday, with Gabrielowitsch as the special feature in the Chopin E. Minor Concerto for piano and full orchestra. Paul Steindorff will conduct a body of forty-five picked musicians, which will form a permanent organization to be called the San Francisco Festival Orchestra. The orchestra will combine with the Cecilia Choral Club, numbering one hundred and twenty-five voices in the rendition of the grand march, "With Sheathed Swords," by Sir Michael Costa, and the beautiful Easter choral, "Unfold ye Portals," from "The Redemption." The Choral Club, under Percy A. R. Dow, will sing, with piano accompaniment, "By Babylon's Wave," one of Gounod's masterpieces. The vocal soloist will be Miss Elso Thornsvard, from the Grand Opera House of Elberfeld. She is a brilliant coloratura soprano, and accompanied by the orchestra, will sing the aria from "Mireille," the work in which she made her debut abroad. She is a San Francisco girl who has climbed to the top of the ladder, and is home on a visit to her people. The Symphony Orchestra will contribute the dramatic overture, "Fingal's Cave," by Medelssohn, and "Three Dances from Nell Gwynne," by Edward German.

"The Crisis" in Oakland

The announcement for the week commencing next Monday evening at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, is "The Crisis," Winston Churchill's dramatization of his own story of the South of which James K. Hackett was the original star. Although this romance has never before been offered the theatregoers of Oakland, it is safe to say that a far greater amount of interest is centered in the coming of the Liberty's new leading lady, Helen Holmes, who makes her initial appearance as the heroine of this drama, than there is in the presentation of the play. For Miss Holmes comes to Oakland very highly recommended, and although still a very young girl, has had a great deal of dramatic experience which unquestionably enables her to qualify for this important position with the Liberty stock company. She was seen here last as leading lady with Dustin Farnum in "The Virginian," and previous to that with the late J. H. Stoddard, with whom she played the leading feminine role in "The Bonnie Brier Bush" for two seasons. She has also played leading roles with Max Figman in "The Man on the Box" and with Wright Lorrimer in "The Shepherd King," and only recently created the leading feminine roles of "The Man from Home" at the Astor Theatre, and in Benjamin Chapin's "Honest Abe" Company at the Garden and Hackett Theatres in New York City. In addition to this, Miss Holmes has played special stock engagements during the summer months in the principal cities of the East. She has a splendid opening role in Virginia Carvel, the heroine of Churchill's play. It is a part that will show her talents to the very best advantage. Landers Stevens will be the Stephen Brice of the production.

A Sentimental Dance

A somewhat mysterious feature of entertainments given by society people on both sides of the Bay of late is a dancing stunt which has won a great deal of applause. The dancer, apparently, a very charming girl, known as the "La Petalia," turns out to be the son of a retired tobacco dealer in a Northern city. This much has been divulged by his manager, C. Poole, a popular clubman, who predicts that La Petalia will soon be making a sensationa on the vaudeville circuit. The dancer carries his own stage paraphernalia for seventeen different dances, including the French version of Salome, which is said to be much more refined than the American.

The William Shakespeare Lectures

William Shakespeare, the famous singing master and musician of London, will give his first lecture at Christion Science hall this Saturday afternoon, April 3, the subject being "The Art of Singing." On Monday night, April 4, he will give his last talk, which will be on "Singing Considered Historically." In this he will illustrate at the piano the various styles of songs by the great masters. These lectures will be of untold value to teachers and students of the vocal art, and will interest every one who is fond of the music of the human voice. Seats at Sherman Clay & Co.'s, and at the hall on the days of the lecture.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The program at the Orpheum for the week beginning this Sunday matinee is of exceptional interest. Its chief new feature will be the celebrated prima donna, Mlle. Zelie de Lussan of Metropolitan Grand Opera House fame, who for years has been recognized as one of the world's greatest lyric artists. She will be heard in several of her most celebrated arias and in some favorite ballads. Her accompanist will be the gifted pianist, Signor Angelo Fronani. S. Miller Kent, one of the most successful of the younger dramatic stars on the American stage, will present a short comedy by Edgar Allen Woolf, entitled "Marriage in a Motor Car." It tells the story of an impromptu wedding for mercenary reasons which after a series of amusing complications results in happiness. Mr. Kent is supported by Miss Donah Benrimo, a San Francisco girl who has won for herself an enviable reputation in the east. Dorothy Keane, a vivacious and engaging comedienne, will also assist Mr. Kent. Joly Violetta, the famous Parisian beauty and danseuse, will make her first appearance in this city and will be assisted by M. Armand, a Brazilian dancer of renown. Violetta has been the recipient of almost extravagant praise in the great European capitals. Her act is in two parts, the first being a series of parodies and the second characteristic Brazilian dances. Elsie Faye, Miller and Weston will introduce what they term "The Act Dainty" which introduces Miss Faye and her associates in songs and dances. Next week will be the last of Tom Nawn & Co., who will present the one act farce, "The Politician." It will also mark the close of the engagement of Charles Matthews, the champion jumper of the world, the Four Casting Dunbars and the delightful Melani Troupe. A new series of Orpheum Motion Pictures will terminate what bids fair to be one of the best bills in the history of the Orpheum.

Two Friends

Morissot turned his head. Over the steep river bank he saw, away to the left, the huge bulk of Mont-Valerien. From it arose, like a white plume, the smoke which a cannon had just belched forth. At the same instant second puff of smoke shot out from the ridge of the fort, and a few seconds later a new thunder roared. Others followed, and from moment to moment the mountain hurled forth its message of death and breathed out heavy white vapors which rose gently through the clear air and made a cloud above the fortress.

M. Dufour shrugged his shoulders. "They are at it again," he said.

Morissot was anxiously regarding the feather of his float as it bobbed up and down. He was suddenly filled with rage, the anger of a man of peace against the madmen who were thus fighting. "People must be lunatics," he growled, "to kill one another in this fashion."

"Worse than wild beasts," replied M. Dufour.

Morissot, who had just taken a bleak, declared, "And it will always be like this so long as there are Governments."

M. Dufour interrupted: "The Republic would not have declared war—"; but Morissot broke in: "With the kings we were always fighting abroad, with the Republic we have war in our own country."

They entered calmly upon a discussion, examining profound questions of policy with the wholesome reason of gentle and temperate men. They agreed upon one point, that men would never attain freedom. And Mont-Valerien thundered unrestingly, wrecking French houses with French shells, scattering death, pounding men to shapeless pulp; cutting short countless dreams, countless expected joys, countless hopes of happiness; and, in that other land across the borders, filling the hearts of wives and mothers and maidens with sorrows which know no end.

"Such is life," said M. Dufour.

"Say, rather, that such is death," replied Morissot, laughing at his play on the words.

All at once they became aware that someone had been marching and had halted behind them. They trembled with sudden alarm. Turning their eyes they saw four men standing at their shoulders; four huge, armed, and bearded men, clad like domestics in livery, and wearing flat caps. Their four rifles were pointed at the two Frenchmen.

The fishing-rods slipped from their hands and floated downstream. In a few seconds the fishers were seized, pinioned, borne away, thrown into a boat, and rowed across to the isle. Behind the house, which they had believed to be abandoned, they saw a score of German soldiers.

A sort of hairy giant, seated astraddle on a chair and smoking a long porcelain pipe, demanded in excellent French, "Well, gentlemen, have you had a good catch?"

A soldier stepped forward and laid at the feet of the officer the netful of fish, which he had been careful to bring away. The Prussian smiled: "Ah! I see you have not done so badly. But we have other business on hand. Listen to me, and do not be alarmed.

"So far as I am concerned, you are two spies who have been sent out to watch me. I capture you and shoot you. You have been pretending to fish, the better to conceal your projects. You have fallen into my hands; so much the worse for you. That is the fortune of war.

"But since you have come out past the outposts, you must certainly have the password for your return. Give me this password, and I give you your lives."

The two friends stood side by side. They were livid, and their hands were twitching slightly with nervous tremors. Both were silent.

The officer continued: "No one will ever know. You will return unharmed and the secret will vanish with you. If you refuse, it is death—instant death. Make your choice."

They remained motionless, without opening their mouths.

The Prussian, with unvarying placidity, stretched out his hand towards the river. "Consider," he began again, "that within five minutes you will be at the bottom of that water. Within five minutes! You both have relatives, I presume?"

Mont Valerien thundered unceasingly.

The two friends remained silently standing. The German gave some orders in his own language. Then he moved away his chair, so as not to remain too near the prisoners; and twelve men came to stand at "attention," twenty paces away. The officer spoke again: "I give you one minute, and not a second more."

Then he suddenly arose, drew near to the two Frenchmen, took Morissot by the arm, dragged him away, and said to him in a low voice: "Quick! the password? Your comrade will know nothing; I shall simply pretend to relent."

Morissot made no reply.

The Prussian then drew M. Dufour aside and spoke to him in the same terms. M. Dufour made no reply.

The two friends stood once more side by side. The officer gave some commands. The soldiers presented arms. Then Morissot's glance fell by chance on the string of gudgeon which lay on the grass a few feet from him. The fish were still quivering, and a ray of sunlight glittered on them. A sudden weakness overcame Morissot, and, in spite of his efforts, his eyes filled with tears. He faltered: "Farewell, Monsieur Dufour."

M. Dufour replied: "Farewell, Monsieur Morissot."

They gripped each other by the hand, shaken from head to foot by irrepressible tremors.

SHOOTING FLYING FISH OFF CATALINA ISLAND

M. Dufour fell at once, face downwards. Morissot, the taller man, swayed, swung around, and fell across the body of his comrade. His face was turned to the skies, and gouts of blood oozed out through where the breast of his tunic was pierced.

The German gave fresh orders, and his men disappeared. Then they returned with ropes and stones, which they tied to the feet of the two dead men, afterwards bearing the bodies to the river-bank.

Mont-Valerien roared without pause: the fort was now surmounted by a mountain of smoke.

Two soldiers took Morissot by the head and the feet; two others took M. Dufour in the same way. One strong swing, then the bodies were thrown far out. They described a curve, then plunged, straight up, into the water, the stones dragging the feet in first. The water splashed up, bubbled, quivered, and then was calm again, though some wavelets rippled out to the banks. A little blood floated on the surface.

The officer, with unruffled serenity, said quietly, "This time the fish have their turn."

Then he returned towards the house. Suddenly he saw the string bag of gudgeon on the grass before him. He picked them up, examined them, and smiled. "Wilhelm!" he cried.

A white-aproned soldier ran up. The Prussian threw him the dead men's catch, and commanded: "Have me these little creatures fried at once, while they are still alive. They will be delicious."

Then he went on smoking his porcelain pipe.

Letters

"Sardonics"

Harris Merton Lyon is a new name in the literary calendar. May his tribe increase. "Sardonics" is the title he has selected for "this little flight of black butterflies," and the name is well chosen. There is much crude strength in the sixteen short stories which make up the contents of the volume, much grimness, and irony and perhaps more truth than all the rest. The stories visualize themselves. One might designate more than one as a masterpiece had not the word lost its significance through ill-use. Take the first, "The Father," Billy Adson contented, prosperous, "fat, florid and forty-five." Billy was a drummer for a jewelry firm, a good fellow, jovial and generous in a selfish way. He probably would have continued indefinitely in the same happy-go-lucky life but for the chance mention of a name in a portion of the newspaper he was not given to reading—the name of his son whom he had deserted twenty years before when the child was little more than an infant. Billy Adson was suddenly smitten with paternal feeling—of course, what easier than to go to this son, claim kinship and step quite comfortably and naturally into the place which ought to have been, and was kept for him. And Billy Adson received a surprise that changed the face of the world for him, for the son had lived his life in another atmosphere than that of bar rooms, smoking cars and amusement palaces. "You can't do a thing in this world with the idea of calmly sauntering off from it and coming back after twenty years to find it just as you want it. The whole wide world has had a chance to get in while you've been gone." He was repudiated and for the first time in his life he realized what it meant to be growing old—and lonely. "The Singer's Heart" is another story of loneliness—of a different kind—an old actor out of an engagement and never likely to make another, tenant of a sky room of a dreary boarding house, haunter of agencies, and yet with his one moment of triumph—the only one of a pretentious aggregation who kept his appointment for a newsboy's entertainment and proved that he still had power to move an audience. "In the Black and Tan" one fairly smells the reek of the stale smoke and villainous drink and glimpses the mongred company of the vile resort. "An Incident of Poison Row" is a grim tragedy of "reformation." "The Empty Scope" carries one out to the Nebraska prairies, the effect of the illimitable space and the unchanging horizon on two young, light-hearted German emigrants, born for human joys and companionship of their kind. "The Girl Who Woudn't Marry" was crushed by a tyrannical, selfish, useless Scotch father who sat like a vulture and devoured his children. Mr. Lyon, if not the first, is one of the very few with courage to treat of this phase of domestic life. The "Sardonics" are not pleasant stories for those who look for mirth and music, but they are compelling. What crudeness there is in the telling is more than compensated for in strength and originality. Harris Merton Lyon is a name worth noting for if this first venture is an indication of his metal, he will be heard again and to good purpose. The Metropolitan Syndicate is sponsor for the issue.

Aunt—Ella, do not vex your husband too much. He will end by going back to his parents.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Ukiah—(1) No, Burns did not find what he was after. (2) Yes, Calhoun has some affidavits and other documentary evidence which prove that the car strike was the result of a conspiracy engineered by some of our leading civic patriots. He will probably spring them when his enemies give him time to breathe.

—Citizen—(1) Yes, Speaker Stanton has announced that he is not a candidate for Governor. (2) No, there has never been a movement organized for the purpose of thrusting blushing honors upon Mr. Stanton. (3) Yes, the machine picked him for the speaker's job. The machine does many funny things which are not comprehensible to the finite mind.

Laborite—No, the principal charge against the present Municipal Administration is merely stupidity. We have not heard of a dissenting voice.

Newcomer—Yes, Assistant District Attorney Harrison is the son of an ex-jurist. I have never heard that his specialty was torts, but it wouldn't surprise me to learn that he is able to display almost human intelligence in expounding the subject of tarts.

PARADOXICAL

"Do you know, my dear," he said to his wife, "that there is something paradoxical about a mule?"

She replied he ought to know if anybody did and asked him why.

"Because, although he is by nature somewhat belligerent, yet he is always backward in deeds of violence."

WHAT HE CAME BACK FOR

Father of Young Girl—I should think you would be satisfied after the treatment you got here last night. I kicked you down the front steps and set the dog on you, and he came back with a big piece of your trousers. Now, what do you want?

Young Man—I'd like that piece of cloth, please.

UNCULTURED ENTHUSIASM

"Laura," said Mrs. Parvenu, on the hotel piazza, to her daughter—"Laura, go and ask the leader of them orchestras to play that 'sympathy from Meddlejohn' over again. It's such an awful favorite of mine and your father's, too!"

HER PECULIAR POSITION.

"Well——"

"Well—er—er—she certainly has a pronounced predilection for rushing in where angels might well be expected to fear to tread. For instance, she claims to be a direct descendant of Patrick Henry, when, as you remember—I mean, as you are aware, although I trust she, for obvious reasons, is not—the late Patrick's specialty was oratory instead of matrimony."—The Chuckler.

Their Knitting Days Are Done

A hullaballoo is abroad carrying feminine protest against the section of the Payne tariff bill imposing a duty on stockings and gloves. Naturally the flame of revolt is fanned by the yellow newspapers whose profit it is to make the women ridiculous on any occasion. It is far more important that the tariff should be loosened on lumber, steel and various building materials; but the noise of this contention is as the low murmur of babbling brooks to the mighty roar of Victoria Falls in comparison with the shrilling of the women whose stockings are to be taxed. Never before have these women complained of the cost of their stockings. Some of them have boasted that these expensive accessories of their attire have cost them little more than the risk of getting them past the customs inspectors added to the temporary discomfort of wearing seven pairs from the steamer to the hotel. If the modern woman knew how to knit her own stockings she would have less time to discuss the tariff on the machine-made article; but the art of knitting has gone the way of the homespun dress and the stiff-starched sunbonnet. Our women are civilized beyond the spinning-wheel age and the epoch when it was part of her household duty to wash and iron her own clothes and the clothes of her family. And this super-civilized woman, not content with the leisure that has come with machinery and a cheap servile labor, is now clamoring for cheaper machine-made stockings. She does not stop to think that cheap stockings for herself may mean no stockings at all for the woman that makes them.

Building for the Scrap Heap

We are told that by the end of 1911 we shall have six Dreadnoughts. Relatively, however, the American navy will not be any stronger than at present, for by the end of 1911 Great Britain will have fourteen and Germany will have thirteen Dreadnoughts. So far the policy of lagging behind has not done us any harm. On the contrary, we have saved money by contributing less lavishly than other nations to the scrap heap. So swift is the growth of naval construction that a ship grows obsolete almost in the time in which it is building. This is especially true of our ships. It takes us from three to four years to build a ship. The English frequently turn out a modern battleship in less than two years. The exceedingly rapid development of naval construction is evidenced from this,—that not one of the great battleships which recently girdled the globe was in existence at the close of the Spanish war and yet many of them, already antiquated, will soon be placed in what naval men call "in ordinary," that is, laid up in some yard and held for use in time of great emergency. After the battleships of the Oregon and Indiana class, which saved the day for us off Santiago, the Kentucky and Kearsarge were added to the navy, and they were regarded as marvels. Today they are regarded as useful for defence on a pinch, but all experts know that their day has gone by. After the Kentucky and Kearsarge came still larger vessels,—the Maine, Missouri and Ohio—and they, too, are now headed for the scrap heap. If they remain afloat three years more they will be pointed out as antiquated specimens of ship construction. Yet the policy of naval expansion goes on. We must remain in the procession. We cannot afford to take a chance at being caught napping.

Shocked by Herrick

In Canada where there is no book censor there are, as in this glorious land of interdiction, self-constituted guardians of public morals who are more to be dreaded than an official functionary vested with authority to ban whatever he considers unwholesome. An official censor is likely to have standards of taste and morals; not so the prurient-minded and meddlesome busybodies in whom a morbid imagination is often productive of unsoundness of judgment. The state of mind of the Canadian busybodies has been expressed in a petition to the authorities at Ottawa to prohibit the importation of Robert Herrick's "Together." Herrick is one of the most sincere of our philosophic novelists. He sees truths about life which vast numbers of men and women feel to be true and which they are grateful to him for having set before them. He has given definiteness to views which before were dim and vague to those who appreciate him. He has given voice to thoughts and feelings which before were inarticulate. He does not write for children, nor for feeble-minded adults, but he is neither vulgar nor obscene. His attitude towards life is healthful and wholesome. Nevertheless he is regarded as shocking not only by the benighted Puritans of Canada but those also of this country. There is nothing singular, however, in the misconception with reference to "Together." Hardly any of the books worthy of serious consideration, published in the last ten years, has escaped the censure of moralists whose taste is on a Laura Jean level. In this connection it is interesting to recall the story of Theodore Dreiser's "Sister Carrie," which is quite as amusing as Mrs. Trollope's tale of the green baize pantalettes on the modest piano legs. That book was favorably passed upon by the official readers of one of the largest American publishing houses and the work had progressed so far that the volume was all but ready to be given to the public when one of the partners took it home for some final supervision. His mother-in-law, or the second cousin of his wife's grandmother, or some such eminent authority took it up to look over, and was aghast to discover that any one she was ever so remotely akin to could commit such iniquity as to stand sponsor for "Sister Carrie." Her arguments prevailed, and the American edition was virtually suppressed. It was "published" in a technical sense, just enough to dodge litigation for breach of contract. The book was a success in England. It had a mild revival in this country later on, when some of our leading critics pronounced judgment that it just missed being great.

When 'Affinities" Fall Out

Mrs. "Affinity" Earle, handicapped with an eight-months old infant, is seeking relief in the divorce court. She says now that it was insanity, not affinity which was the primal ailment, and that if she had known, etc. "I wedded in a huff, while in a psychologic maze," is her explanation of the sensational complication through which she and Artist Ferdinand Pinney Earle justified their engagement while he was still married to his former wife whom he shipped off to France to obtain a divorce. She is now prepared to go to extremes to secure her freedom, even to the extent of admitting the illegality of her marriage and the consequent illegitimacy of its offspring. No court and no law can compel uncongenial partners to dwell together in discord, but there is no reason why those who have proved their unfitness for marriage should be permitted to go on indefinitely contracting new unions at will, and leaving wives more or less dependent and cross-bred children to complicate social problems. Mrs. Earle would give ear to neither reason nor argument when she determined to wed her affinity. She deliberately walked into the net because she was confident that she could escape if the "psychological maze" proved uninteresting. Why should she be legally freed now in order to conjure up another "psychological maze" when her eye lights on an eligible object? She married in a "huff." Well and good. Ill tempered children frequently beat their heads on the floor in the same sort of a "huff," but Mother Nature takes no pity on them when they have recovered from their tantrums and object to the self-inflicted bumps and bruises. English courts take a more rational view of the mental anguish of these spoiled darlings. Some years ago a foolish girl insisted on marrying a Matabele chief who captivated her at an Earl's Court exhibition where he appeared in native costume as one of the attractions of the show. No amount of expostulation availed with her, and she eventually carried out her design though it involved a journey to South Africa. It was not so very long before she was an applicant for a divorce, but the hard-hearted judge to whom her case was assigned drew from her the admission that the beatings, bitings and threats of mutilation were what might have been reasonably expected from a savage, and then told her that it was no part of the mission of the law to nullify the outcome of her deliberate choice. If she married a Matabele savage she would have to make the best of a savage husband. It was drastic medicine but wholesome, and probably did more to curb the silly infatuation of girls than any other course that could have been taken. Some philosopher once remarked that Thomas and Jeanne Carlyle were well married. As theirs was a notoriously infelictous union some surprise was manifested at the idea of their being "well" mated. But the attitude was justified in the explanation that as each of them was foredoomed to render any partner miserable, it was better that they should react upon each other than spoil two households. The same may be said of a large percentage of the "unhappy" couples who apply for legal relief.

Our Miserable Plight

A glance at the calendar and we are reminded that this is the season of the year "when the fields catch flower" and that we should be out under the blue canopy, bathed in happy peace and heavenly fragrance. In this glorious season when the sap begins to move and the young man's fancy lightly turns to maidens fair, the rest of us ought to harken to the call of the woods, get out and hear things grow, with the sunshine overhead, the grass at our feet and our hearts open to the immensity of things. But here in the dust and grime of the street we loiter, absorbed in endless strife. The calendar tells us it is spring; the newspapers, that the once light-hearted city of San Francisco is still in the winter of its discontent made rigorous by passions that have transfigured men into savages and impelled them to cruelty and brutality. The contest rages with as much vehemence as ever; the factions are still tearing each other tooth and nail, the ground is heaped with epithets and the casualties are piling up. What or when the end is to be no man knoweth. Suffice it that the end contemplated is the civic well-being and that zeal for this benign consummation animates all that has been and is being done. Which reminds us of Addison's observation that the world has been deceived by nothing so much as by zeal; that so many passions have hid themselves under it, and so many mischiefs have arisen from it that it would have been for the benefit of mankind if it had never been reckoned in the catalogue of the virtues. Such zeal as we have seen here is the kind that in other ages employed racks and gibbets, galleys and dungeons; the kind that burned the body to save the soul. Here in the city that bears the name of the most perfect exponent of love and kindness in Christian tradition we have been invoking justice in the field of resentment and revenge. Men are behaving toward one another like barbarians. Is it not time for us to divest ourselves of our heats and prepossessions? We are getting ready for Portola Day. Would it not be well to set a date upon which to usher in the air of festal expectation? It occurs to us by way of a happily inspired thought that it might be well to get up a petition to Judge Lawlor to end the whole miserable drama by midsummer.

The Forbidding Prospect

With a view to hastening the cessation of hostilities we will take occasion to suggest to the public officials who have vouchsafed their services to the holy Sanhedrim that from present indications their zeal is not likely to be requited in accordance with fond expectation. There is confirmation strong of an iniquitous, rebellious and contumacious spirit in the community. It is reflected in the answers of talesmen. Twenty-two in one day affirmed their sympathy with the man who has been anathematized and maranathematized up hill and down date for more than two years. It is fairly certain that the affections of the people have been alienated from the zealous exemplars of the unwisdom of being righteous overmuch. The populace has ceased to squander its reverence on pinchbeck heroes who refuse to play fair and scruple not at violating the rules of the game. No garlands are a-weaving for the Spreckels' brow. By their transgressions the patriots have again and again proved their title to the distrust of the people. Intent ostensibly on vindicating justice they have trampled on all the inviolable principles of justice. Self-consecrated to the improvement of the moral tone of the community, they have let loose all the worst passions that can afflict a people. Professedly eager to purge the government of corruption they have made a mockery and a scandal of the most sacred of the institutions of government. Finding themselves tangled in the web of their own misdeeds they have become so desperate in their maneuvring as to abandon even pretense to decency in the employment of expedients. For example, consider their relations with Police Judge Deasy, the young man by whom the blanket search warrant was issued and before whom the jaunty Older swore out a warrant for libel in the vain hope of suggestionizing the public into the delusion that he has a character that is susceptible of impairment. Young Magistrate Deasy may be a very estimable gentleman, but if so it does him a grievous injustice to employ him as an accessory in these matters. Young Mr. Deasy began his career as a deputy in the Hon. William Langdon's office when that fragrant official was Mayor Schmitz's superintendent of schools. Subsequently he became a deputy under Langdon in the district attorney's office. He was appointed from that office to the bench by Mayor Taylor, a protege of the Graft Prosecution. In addition to all this, and as significantly supplementary thereto, it should be mentioned that Mr. Deasy is the son of the distinguished gentleman of the same surname who served on the memorable Oliver Grand Jury, and who, in the years agone held office by appointment of Mayor Phelan. Whether Magistrate Deasy is a man so happily constituted that, despite his antecedents, he is able to act with absolute impartiality is a question which we will not attempt to answer, but we will not refrain from suggesting that Mr. Older and Mr. Burns in their indifference to the impropriety of utilizing him for their purposes, have made it clear that they answered it to their own satisfaction and that their answer is not complimentary to Mr. Langdon's ex-deputy. Thus we see that the ruthless prosecutors are concerned for nothing but the success of their own enterprise. They care not how long a trail of damaged reputation they leave behind.

Perspective Impressions

Wanted—A man for Mayor who doesn't know and doesn't want to know anything about politics.

To be successfully unscrupulous in the ways and means by which he pursues his aims the knave must combine foresight and prudence with boldness and energy.

Mr. Taft has made it clear that he expects to build no fires under Congress and that he will refrain scrupulously from every kind of executive interference. And yet he promised to keep alive the Roosevelt policies.

"I believe," says Mr. Harriman, "that the attention of the public should be turned away from the corporations and toward the management of City, State and National Governments." Mr. Harriman is a political heretic. The muckrakers will get him if he doesn't watch out.

Dr. Luther H. Gulick, a noted scientist, claims to have discovered a cure for "fuzzymindedness." Will Dr. Taylor be glad to hear of it?

A collar button has been found in an Oklahoma man's appendix. It's probably the one he couldn't find under the bureau.

It used to be said (and by the ladies, too, God bless them!) that only three times in her life should a lady's name appear in the public prints; first, when she was born; second, when she married; third, when she died. Nevertheless we sympathize with those afflicted ones who are lamenting that their names were not emblazoned in the newspapers' Page of Fame in connection with Rupert Blue and the bubonic plague. For not only do we believe generally in giving women everything they want, but in particular, the woman who desires publicity deserves—publicity.

Letter to a Juryman

My Dear Jurybird:

Your communications have been duly received and their contents noted. I can assure you of the sincere sympathy of the entire community. Yet, in truth, you have only yourselves to blame for the plight in which you find yourselves. If you had been less "candid" in your answers to the questions by counsel; if you had stretched your consciences somewhat; if you had been less punctilious in estimating the weight, strength and general character of your opinions, you would not now be prisoners "at the discretion" of a court that doubted your honesty and openly expressed its suspicion of your integrity as citizens.

Your own conclusion as to the court's reason for consigning you to the custody of the sheriff, as you would have been consigned if you had been convicted felons, is probably accurate. In the opinion of the court you could not be trusted. If the court were to be as "candid" in explanation of the reason for locking you up as it insists all jurors shall be in their relations with the court, it would, in all likelihood, transpire that you are in custody to avoid being corrupted by the Calhoun people. There is no reason to believe that this court has any suspicion of venal intention by the prosecution in this case. And if such suspicion does lurk in the mind of the court it had no part in the "discretion" that consigned you to the custody of the sheriff.

You have probably observed what the effect of your imprisonment has been on other jurors summoned upon successive venires. Every opinion has been "fixed"; many of the jurors have even asserted that they could not try the case fairly and impartially; some of them have hastened to state their prejudice for the defendant or against the prosecution; a few have said that they were in sympathy with the prosecution. It is absurd to believe that these citizens could not have tried this case fairly. It is ridiculous to suppose that more than eight hundred intelligent, honest, law-respecting Americans are so bigoted that they could not sit on a jury to weigh the evidence for and against a fellow American under the laws of their country. No, my dear Jurybird, these men came to the jurybox determined to disqualify themselves. And they armed themselves with this determination because they did not wish to be taken from their homes, their families and their business "at the discretion of the court."

You were very foolish to be caught in the trap of the court's "discretion." I hope you will learn wisdom from this irksome and degrading experience.

Do you know that the prosecution, through Mr. Heney, has hinted at a "thirteenth juror?" Do you know what that means? I will tell you. A thirteenth juror is what is called by the statute "an alternate." It is the function of the thirteenth juror to be the "death watch" on the jury of which he is the "alternate." Some of you are very old. The prosecution is thinking that the trial will be protracted. One or more of you may die before a verdict is rendered. In that event the thirteenth or the fourteenth or the fifteenth juror will take the place of those who are devoured by the tomb. That's a nice prospect for some of you, isn't it? You've probably heard of persons who stand around waiting for dead men's shoes. Well, Mr. Heney proposes to fit some of your shoes to the feet of living jurors if, as he calculates, some of the old boys on this jury are summoned to a higher court where the juries are permanent and the judgments infallible.

Already, I observe, there is dissension in your little band. You have appealed to the court to be separated from each other. Crabbed age and youth cannot live together; (I quote from the immortal William); youth is full of pleasance, age is full of care; youth like summer morn, age like winter weather; youth like summer brave, age like winter bare. Youth is full of sport, age's breath is short; youth is nimble, age is lame; youth is hot and bold, age is weak and cold; youth is wild, and age is tame. Some of you are restless in your captivity; some of you love to bask in the sunlight of Union Square, listening to the chirping of the sparrows. The younger men of your bunch are impatient to partake of the pleasures of the town when the lights are blazing and the crowds are surging; the older men are clamoring for bed an hour after they have dined. It is the natural consequence that you should desire to go your several ways in search of the comfort and amusement best suited to your age and previous habit. Your request to be kept as far apart from each other as possible was reasonable; but I am surprised that the court acceded to your petition. It is a dangerous precedent. Having given you an inch some of you may demand an ell. Now that crabbed age is separated from frolicksome youth it may not be long before age and youth may ask to be again segregated. Familiarity invariably breeds contempt, and enforced intimacies stir up strife.

I don't suppose that you have heard all the news concerning the latest outrages perpetrated by the agents of the prosecution in this case. You are probably unaware that William J. Burns, or "Gumshoe Bill the Detective," as you call him, has constituted himself judge, jury, executioner and District Attorney for the prosecution. From the questions propounded in your last letter I surmise that you have heard something of "Gumshoe's" antics. The four jurors recently added to your exclusive set have probably told you about the raid on the offices of the United Railroads, but I do not think they have fully realized the fact that "Gumshoe" is now the only thing in San Francisco. When you went into eclipse you imagined, perhaps, that William H. Langdon was the District Attorney; well, that was a dream—he is no more the District Attorney of this city than I am. He may think he is, but he has another thought in cold storage and the ice box is in "Gumshoe Bill's" cellar. Chief of Police Cook thinks he is what his title implies; but as a matter of fact Captain Anderson or Sergeant Mulcahy are as firmly vested with that authority as Cook. And do you know who the real District Attorney and Chief of Police is? I will tell you that also. It is no less a personage than "Gumshoe Bill" the detective.

But, say you, there must be some shadow of authority for this usurpation. That is true. You are a discerning juror. And who do you suppose is this "shadow of authority?" It's Deasy! Have you ever heard of Deasy? I wot not. Deasy is a recent product of this prolific graft prosecution. He came up in a night—like a mushroom on a compost heap. He was sired by Jeremiah Deasy whose chief bid for local fame was his activity as a member of the Oliver Grand Jury. The scion of this Jeremiah Deasy was promoted from the office of the District Attorney to be a police judge. He is now known as "Blanket" Deasy, because he issued the search warrant with which "Gumshoe Bill" raided the offices of the United Railroads. Deasy is a daisy.

So, my dear Jurybird, you will understand that "Gumshoe Bill" the detective is about all there is of "the administration of justice" in San Francisco. What he says goes; and he is saying it most of the time. But I have an idea that "Gumshoe's" days are numbered. I do not believe that the better element of San Francisco's citizenry will long endure the tyrannical methods of this special policeman of the graft prosecution. I think he will be called down with a dull, sickening thud before he goes much farther. This town is getting sick and tired of Burns. He doesn't belong here anyway; and if we are to have another boss we prefer that he shall be one of our own. "Gumshoe Bill" is a rank outsider; and we are about ready to throw him back over the garden wall.

Of course we depend on you and your fellow prisoners to help us in our effort to restore this city to its normal condition. Your verdict will determine whether San Francisco is to be a prosperous business community, or a house divided against itself; a place of quarrels and contentions; a breeding spot for all the hatreds that are conceived in the human heart; or whether it shall be once more a city of opportunity and a metropolis where men may thrive by their industry and win to fame and fortune by their own effort unhampered by the dictation of a Spreckels, a Phelan, an Older or a Burns.

Hoping to hear from you in such a verdict, I am your sincere friend and well-wisher,

A Reminiscence

(From the Spanish of Emilia Pardo Bazan)

No man was more popular in society than the Marquis of Zaldua. Secretary of the Embassy, of fastidious appearance and skilled in all the graces of social intercourse, he was very much in demand at the functions of the fashionable herd. He was regarded by his male acquaintances as one of the most fortunate of mortals. All the ladies, they said, loved the Marquis. Speaking in confidence, he declared that no man was less successful than he with the gentle, capricious sex.

"If the opposite were the case with me, if I were a conqueror, I should say nothing about it," he would add smiling. "But since I conquer no one, there is no reason why I should play the mysterious and conceal my defeats. I am always the victim and I have despaired of besieging strongholds, for I know the blockade must be raised with prudence in order to save even one's self-respect.

"Reflecting upon the matter I have come to believe that my ill-fortune is the result of what they call my social success. Have you ever observed that the women who are least loved are those feted ones, those queens of society who in passing excite a murmur of admiration, and to whom all the men have some light pleasantry to say? Something similar must happen to the men who in very select circles do not play the part of the slighted one. Moreover, I believe—now do not laugh—that my careful home training has been a disadvantage to me. It was inculcated in me from a child to be very courteous to ladies, and it is impossible for anyone to treat them with more respect and delicacy than I. When talking to them I burn incense before them; when I smile upon them I dedicate a poem to them; and, although it may seem strange, it sometimes occurs to me that women, in consequence of the dependent state in which their sex has lived since time immemorial, have an unconfessed weakness for harsh and insolent men, recognizing in them the lord and master. We who are ready to take down the moon for their pleasure perhaps pass for fools or weaklings, two things equally bad."

One day while the Marquis was speaking in this vein to a friend, the latter asked him whether it could be possible that so much gallantry, so much perfection had never gained him more than sympathy, and whether he had never felt himself the master of a woman's heart. The Marquis, after a few moments of thought, answered:

"Well, time has passed since then; the lady is no longer living, and if you will permit me to conceal her name, I will tell you the story of my one success. After you know the whole story you will not think me boastful for having related it. It is a negative victory and goes to prove what we have said before," here the Marquis smiled with a certain humorous sadness, "namely, that I shall never eclipse the Don Juans nor the Manaras.

"On one of the occasions when I returned to Spain on leave of absence to see my mother, she asked me to visit on my way back to Paris one of her friends, a duchess whom she had not seen for many years because she was living in retirement, after the death of a very dear daughter, at a magnificent country seat a short distance from Bayonne. Having determined to fulfil the desire of my mother, I also made up my mind not to be bored, or at least not to show that I was, during the hours of my visit. I alighted at the station nearest to the country place of the Duchess, where the chaplain of her household was awaiting me with a break.

"Although a lady of such distinction, the Duchess received me with evidences of pleasure, even coming out to greet me at the vestibule. She was dressed in deep mourning with no ornaments but the pearls in her ears, which for their perfect equality, size and the beauty of their orient, were of inestimable price."

"Like the two pearls you often wear of evenings, in your shirt bosom?"

"Exactly. My first act upon seeing the Duchess was to take her hand and kiss it with warmth and devotion. To my surprise I saw that this simple attention caused the blood to mount to her cheeks. How long it had been since anyone had kissed her hand! I do not know why, but upon noticing this it occurred to me to flatter the poor lady a little, to treat her as a young man of good society would treat a young and beautiful woman, with mingled respect and gallantry.

"The first words of the Duchess were devoted to my great resemblance to my mother and she spoke with the tender emotion with which one recalls the affections and pleasures of the past. Then she added that, knowing what boys were, she wished me to feel entirely free in her house, and, knowing the hours for meals and understanding that there were horses and carriages at my disposition, I could spend my time as I pleased. I replied with warmth that I had come out of my way solely for the purpose of seeing her and spending my time in her society, and that she would not be so cruel as not to permit me to enjoy her conversation and friendship, although it could be for but a short time. Again her face flushed and when she indicated to the chaplain that he should show me over the estate, I begged, if it would not incommode her, that she herself should accompany me at whatever hour would suit her best, in order that the recollection of the place might always be associated with that of its mistress in the sanctuary of my memory. The Duchess at once called for her parasol and garden hat, and, without further delay, requested that we proceed at once to make the rounds of the gardens, hothouses, woods, and the cottages or settlements of the dependents. I offered her my arm and supported her firmly, with that tension of the muscles which we employ

Martinez: A Painter with Something to Say

By Salvator Muscoe

The position in the art world held by Xavier Martinez the painter, formerly of Mexico, Paris, and San Francisco, and now of Piedmont, is in many ways curious as it is in many ways interesting. As an artist it may be said that he is very generally approved. Of this there can be no doubt whatever. But it is equally certain that he is by no means generally appreciated. By common consent he has been accorded a place in the front rank of Californian artists. He is accepted as one of the few really important men; but neither the quality nor the degree of his importance is fully realized even by his admirers. It is true that there are those who place him at the head of that small group of artists here in the West who have really done distinguished work in painting. Whether or not he is entitled to pre-eminence contemporary criticism cannot say; but however he may be rated, it is doubtful if the reasons for his rank are understood by the majority of those who yield homage to his art. In other words, and to repeat, he is approved without being appreciated.

Martinez is primarily a painters' painter. He is too sincere to be popular; too much of an artist to be insincere. He is a painter in whose technique other painters must perforce recognize mastery. By the same token he appeals to the connaisseur. His pictures in the Macbeth gallery in New York have received the highest commendation from a number of the foremost artists and difficult critics in the East. It was also of these pictures that a French critic wrote in the Journal Des Debates that among the best paintings that he had seen in America were those of Martinez. Such commendation —the commendation of the connaisseur—Martinez has always commanded. His most casual and fugitive sketch inevitably arrests the attention of persons of taste. He touches nothing without giving to it the impress of an artistic consciousness. But such qualities and powers do not bring success so quickly as an ability of a much lower order frequently does. The approval of the artist and the connaisseur are unquestionably very charming and gratifying things, but they are of painfully small assistance in helping an artist to dispose of his pictures.

The development of Martinez, who always had something to say in art, has been consistent, symmetrical. After a period of medal-winning for academic drawings of singular freedom combined with delicate faithfulness, he passed through a period of study under Gerome whose rigidly classical influence would have dried up the springs of creative expression in a student endowed with a less vigorous originality. In all of his student work can be seen not only the hand of the artist, but also the brain of the artist with something to say.

Martinez took all the Atelier Gerome and the Ecole des Beaux Arts, in which institutions he spent the better part of five years, had to give him; but he took far more from his study of the old masters and from the example and approval of such painters as Whistler and Carriere. It was the latter, one of the most intellectual painters of modern times, who advised Martinez to remain in Paris, prophesying for him a brilliant career. Preserving at all times a high degree of individuality, Martinez labored under these varying influences and still labors with conspicuous sincerity, large understanding, and that feeling for his art and respect for his tools that marks the true painter.

It may be said that an ability to paint creditable, pleasing, or marketable pictures is a thing of minor importance. It is the artist's relation to Art that counts. A painter may be appraised in his relation to the art of his community, to the art of his country, to the contemporary art of the world, or to the art of all time. It would be idle to measure the majority of so-called artists by any but the minor or provincial standards; Martinez, on the other hand, can be fitly judged only by the major or universal standards. He stands in a distinct and high relation to Art. He is not merely a contributor to the sum of art products (in common with every painter, good, indifferent, bad, and mediocre), but he is an integral part of the forward movement in art. As such he stands almost alone in this part of the world, and in this fact lies his true significance.

These things being understood, it becomes at once apparent that his importance is of the larger sort. His place in the community is curiously similar to the positions held by such men—to mention only a few—as Simon and Cottet in France; Orpen, Steere, and Lambert in England; and Henri, Prendergast, and Davies in America. To all of these men recognition, save by a limited few, came—in precisely the same manner that it is coming to Martinez—with reluctance. Each of these men is doing in his own way not only the creative thing, but the constructive thing; each, while adding something to the volume of art, is, at the same time, giving to the mass a forward movement. The labor of such men will leave art not only an accretion, but also an advance, which, after all, is the only thing worth doing.

As the recognition of connaisseurs came promptly to these men, so it came promptly to Martinez. For the layman and for the general public, he is either unknown (as they once were) or is regarded merely as a person connected in some way with the abstract thing, a reputation. But, also like them, Martinez is destined to come into his own. Already collectors, particularly those who seek works representative of Californian art, are acquiring Martinez canvases from time to time, recognizing, doubtless, their growing importance and value. Of these Mr. J. D. Hahn of Oakland is one. "The Bridge," which is reproduced as a frontispiece in this paper, is one of a considerable number of canvases by Martinez that Mr. Hahn has placed in his collection during the past few years.

But behind all these considerations there is something more—something pertinent, something revealing. We know the tangible productions of Martinez the painter. We know his technique. We know that, being above all things a painter, his usual medium is oil; and some of us know also his remarkable skill in water-color, pastel, autolithography, crayon, pen-an-ink, etching by a variety of methods, and wood-engraving. All of these things, in which we at once see the mastery of media, constitute the voice and the idiom of his art; but they would represent no more than the work of the average successful painter were it not for the fact that, unlike the average successful painter, Martinez always has something to say.

One of the trite expressions of the "art-reporter" is that this or that artist "is a poet." In the case of Martinez the ascription has a new significance. His painting contains a far greater implication of poetry and intellect than the casual observer suspects, and it is in these qualities that much of his power resides. His pictures express the consciousness of an artist who not only feels his art, but whose attitude toward all the arts

A Curious Combination

The line-up of the Board of Supervisors on the nickel-in-the-slot machine ordinance which has been passed to print is somewhat surprising. The Phelan stable presented almost a united front against the ordinance. Bancroft, Giannini, Hocks, McLaren, Murphy, Payot and Jennings voted to perpetuate the popular little gambling device. And yet the nickel-in-the-slot machine is pronounced by Dr. Dille and other distinguished authorities on sin one of Satan's favorite implements. In such matters I am not learned, but while recognizing Dr. Dille as an authority and something of an expert, I do not always agree with him as to ways and means of improving our morals. I recognize the gambling instinct as peculiar to human nature, and I believe that if nickel-in-the-slot machines are banished the devotees of that contrivance will play craps or something else that will facilitate their passion for separating themselves from their money. But my views on this subject are of little importance compared with the attitude of the Phelan stable, for it is one of the aphorisms of this talented bunch of reformers that organized vice is always allied in municipal politics with the public service corporations. Has that great truth-finder, the Rev. E. R. Dille, any comments to make?

Caution the Watchword of Reformers

Of course the explanation of the attitude of the reformers is that they are conscious of the importance of "doing politics." Their hatred of vice is measured by the political strength of the particular form of vice which is for the moment exciting reprehension. As a matter of fact there is not a vast difference between performers and reformers. They all know the side their bread is buttered on. At present the Administration realizes the advisability of conciliating the exponents of the wide-open town propaganda. There is a growing demand for more personal liberty and less meddlesomeness, and though the lid is far from on there has been much uneasiness in that powerful element that contributes the atmosphere which has long been the boast of this laughter-loving community. It is felt by producers of gaiety that they are indulged not because the reformers are in sympathy with them but because the reformers regard their political success as identical with the "greater good" which must be promoted at all hazards. The interests that animate the night life and that impart buoyant individuality to the whole city must therefore, as every reformer knows, be handled with care, with caution and with masterly discretion.

When Biggy Fell Into Disfavor

This policy of conciliating the interests that Dr. Dille abhors has been followed consistently by the reformers. Shortly after William J. Biggy was appointed Chief of Police he showed a disposition to put the lid on and the reformers were thrown into a spasm of indignation. It has been rumored ever since his death that one of the main objections urged against him was that he was reluctant to give "protection" to what is known as the municipal crib, an institution which enjoys the patronage of one of the chastest of our civic patriots. Chief Biggy also incurred powerful disfavor by putting the lid on Chinatown. Biggy had the impression, which was fixed, I believe, even at the time of his death, that somebody was getting a rake-off from the gamblers and he was so strict that most of the gamblers remained in Oakland much to the disgust of influential property owners who derived a fat income in rents before the fire. And by the way, the reformers will hear from landlords if they put through that nickel-in-the-slot machine ordinance. The cigar dealer and the saloon-keeper for whom the little gambling contrivance acts as a salesman will not be the only persons to suffer from the loss of its services. Rents will drop and superfluous clerks will lose their jobs. The proposition to banish the machine is therefore a more serious one than it appears to be at first blush.

The Embarrassing Situation

The men behind the reform machine are rolling their eyes in high frenzy in consequence of the embarrassing situation brought about by the anti-gambling crusade. As one of them, a henchman of Tommy Hickey, the man with a cinch on the Public Administrator's office, expressed it the other day, "it doesn't pay to be too damned good in politics"; also, "there are some things that should be let alone on the eve of a campaign and this is one of them; if the Board puts through the slot ordinance without the assistance of the Phelan stable the holy-rollers will accuse us of standing in with the wicked and at the same time the gang will blame us for letting the pesky thing slip through." From the same enlightened authority I learn that our professional civic patriots realize that they have given us one of the worst Administrations that the city has ever had despite its putative freedom from corruption. Nevertheless they are not hopeless. Though they are not filled with enthusiasm over Coroner Leland's prospects as a candidate for Mayor, they are conscious of his strength and will accept him if his backers will accept their candidate for District Attorney. To keep out of jail is the main desideratum with some of our civic patriots.

The Laugh That Failed

Woman, even the loveliest, is impervious to ridicule of her fashions. It is always a waste of satire when it is directed at woman in her gear. The only profit to the satirist, therefore, is self satisfaction in the knowledge of a duty performed, which is something less than the per-

...sequent upon the realization that an honest, earnest effort has resulted in a folly reformed. Man, mere man, is still laughing at the hoopskirts of our grandmothers and the Grecian bend that made some of our mothers absurd in their debutante days; but it was not the laughter of man that gave the hoopskirts to the goats of the town dumps and lifted the hump from the feminine cocyx. Like smallpox under modern treatment the fashion of hoopskirts and the Grecian bend freak "ran their course." They died of inanition—wasted away, mocking the meat of the vanity upon which they fed.

Ridicule That is Futile

So it will happen to the latest fashion in feminine headgear. And I predict that these salad-bowl hats; these beribboned and beflowered dishpan affairs; these scuttle-shaped monstrosities will speedily go the way of the hoopskirt and the Grecian bend. But not in response to the jibe, the jeer and the hoarse laughter of man. The fashion will change; and that quickly; for woman, lovely woman, will soon learn that her loveliness is in eclipse under the awful hat she is wearing. Before the advent of the pot hat the streets of San Francisco swarmed with pretty women; now every pretty woman looks like a Chinese coolie in a paddy field. Market street at mid-day is a broad grin from the City Hall to the water front— a masculine grin that disturbs the feminine amour-propre not in the slightest degree. It is a psychological axiom that woman is more a slave to her fashions than to the man she loves. The prettiest woman in Europe or America would disfigure herself beyond recognition, if fashion should so decree. And man has long since learned that women dress neither to please the men nor to excite the envy of other women; if they dressed to please the men they would be always beautiful in flowing gowns and their hair would be forever their crowning glory; if they dressed to excite the jealousy or envy of other women they would always wear silk attire and jewels to out-dazzle the glitter and splendor of the Taj Mehal. But in truth fine raiment, becoming garments and barbaric adornment are exceptional; or perhaps I should say that the quality of woman's gear is invariably subordinated to form and style. Fashion is a feminine obsession. Our grandmothers died of liver-squeeze induced by tight lacing, and they were suicides, for they knew that tight lacing was fatal. The feet of women today are corned and bunioned by tight shoes and high heels until they resemble the feet of a Nilotic crocodile; but tight shoes and high heels are fashionable and our women only utter their agony in the presence of their husbands whose admonition and advice are as the prayers and promises of the priests of Jupiter addressed to the Christian martyrs who had elected to be devoured by the wild beasts in the arenas of Diocletian. Those Christian martyrs were monomaniacs; these women who are wearing soup tureens are paranoiacs.

We Paid Them For Their Labor

The banquet to Dr. Rupert Blue in appreciation of what he did for San Francisco in ridding the city of a plague of rats, and, incidentally, preventing an epidemic of the bubonic plague, has aroused a vast hubbub among those who assisted in this work and whose names were omitted from the panegyrics of the orators at the banquet. As I understand the purpose of the honor conferred on Dr. Blue it was wholly a personal affair and would, in all probability have been as freely offered to any other official who might have been detailed to direct the work of sanitation. The promoters of the feast desired to celebrate the event, and Dr. Blue was the opportunity. As for the others, they merely performed their share of the work at so much per day. Everybody except some public spirited women of the leisure class received money for their labor. Otherwise they would not have done the work. The laborer is always worthy of his hire; but he is seldom worthy of more than his hire. If all the persons who are now complaining that all the "honor" has been conferred on Dr. Blue, and that they who so ably assisted him have not even been mentioned, had volunteered to do this work without pay, there would be justice in their complaint. But a fireman or a policeman or a member of the Board of Health who is paid for the performance of his official duties has as much reason to complain of scant appreciation by the public whom he serves for a monthly stipend, as have the protesting doctors, sanitary inspectors and rat catchers who are complaining in this instance. When we hire a man to clean a sewer and he does the work satisfactorily we may say to him, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant"; but the kudos is not obligatory.

"The master has at last come home from the tavern. But madame need not bother to make a scene. I told him just exactly what I thought of him already, on the stairs."

The Passing of Modjeska

Modjeska's stage career is ended, and so, too, perhaps, will be her earthly career before this paper is rolled off the press. The story of Modjeska's career as an actress is especially interesting to San Franciscans, since it was in the old California Theatre, the house whose early history is associated with the names of John McCullough, Barton Hill and Edwin Booth, that she made her debut in English drama. Modjeska came from a family of stage artists in Poland, but it was not with the idea of continuing a histrionic career that she came to America. She had an engagement for life in the government theatre at Warsaw where she had tasted the dangers of political uprisings. Though her husband, Count Bozenta-Chlapowski has said he was not important enough to have been in danger of exile, none the less it is true that he was sufficiently identified with some revolutionary movement to earn himself a short term as a political prisoner. It became advisable for him to leave Poland. It was in 1875 that a little band of self-exiled Poles determined to leave their troubled country and found an Arcadian home in California, and it was in the Centennial year that they arrived in the United States. "Oh, what a darling, hopeful, enthusiastic little party we were!" once wrote the great actress; "there was a young Polish writer, unknown then to fame, Sienkiewicz, who earned his living on our fruit farm by sending his 'Charcoal Sketches' to the papers in Poland. There was a young artist who drew California types and sketched the people at work in the vineyards. He was fortunate, too, for he also sold his work. There was our gentleman farmer, who ran the fruit farm; there were my husband and myself, who owned the farm and who hoped to become rich with out beautiful golden fruits." It was an idylic life while it lasted, but, as Modjeska sadly continued, though they understood art, music and literature, they did not comprehend hard, prosaic work. The blooded hounds were fed on fresh eggs and spring chickens, and the artists and literati lounged in hammocks and adored the scenery, and nobody bought the fruit. Suddenly the actress awoke to the realities. "Soon we shall have no money!" It was necessity that brought Modjeska back to the stage.

Back to the Stage

While her husband and son plowed the fields and cultivated the orchards she set herself a new task, that of mastering English, and a monumental task it proved, for haste was imperative. There was not time to gain a conversational intimacy with the new tongue, and Modjeska decided that for the first she would content herself with committing to memory only the English of the parts in which she wished first to appear. She had unbounded confidence in her well-trained memory and it did not play her false. In less than four months she was letter perfect in Adrienne Lecouvreur, Cleopatra, Juliet and Ophelia. Her tutor, a young Pomeranian lady, Miss Josephine Tucholsky, was as enthusiastic as the actress, and deserves her full share for the success of the enterprise. Hill and McCullough, like theatrical managers and actors in general, were ready to make large allowances for the representations made on behalf of unknown genius. They assumed that Modjeska was some clever amateur, and, though they listened politely to the praises of Miss Tucholsky, they, as well as other managers, were by no means so willing to waste their time in giving her a hearing. At last an appointment was almost wrung out of Hill, but when the hour arrived the stage carpenters were making so much noise that it was impossible to do anything, and he was only too ready to make use of so valid an excuse, when the intrepid Miss Tucholsky was seized with an inspiration. She suggested Pacific Hall, next door. Standing in the middle of the bare room, without stage effects to aid her and with only one man for an audience, the most bored stage manager in the world, with Miss Tucholsky reading the other parts, Modjeska went through the last scene of Adrienne Lecouvreur. Hill was electrified. "My dear Madame," he said, "you may play in the California Theatre whenever you are ready and as long as you wish." Next day another appointment was made, and with Hill and McCullough present, and the stage accessories as aid, the balcony scene of Romeo and Juliet was added to Adrienne Lecouvreur, and before the day closed Modjeska was engaged for two weeks at the California. It was an August night in 1877 that the memorable debut was made. The play was Adrienne Lecouvrer, and supporting Modjeska were Tom Keane and Harry Edwards. The house was not full. It is recorded that the box office receipts were only $465, but it was a night of triumph, never to be forgotten by any of the fortunate few who were present. The Evening Post, of which Colonel Hinton was then editor, was the only paper in San Francisco that gave Modjeska notice before her appearance, but now the press became vociferous in her praise. The theatre was packed nightly, and the rest is history.

Nurses Rally to the Defense of Rats

Something like consternation was created in the Hahnemann Hospital the other day when the superintendent decreed that rats should be banished from the institution. Immediately there was a revolt akin to that which was caused by Dr. Blue's crusade. The hospital revolt was organized by the nurses, for it was against their rats that the decree was directed—not the common or sewer rodent that is partial to the germ bubonic, but the rat of fashion that serves to bolster out feminine locks and that is believed to harbor germs of all kinds without discrimination. According to sanitary science a rat by any other name is not less conducive to the diffusion of disease than Dr. Blue's pet aversion. But the hospital nurses, notwithstanding their professional zeal, were loath to sacrifice one of Dame Fashion's creations on the altar of science, and they rebelled. An indignation meeting was held and resolutions were adopted pronouncing the rat one of the essential first aids to beauty and censuring the head nurse for infringing the personal liberty that is guaranteed by the constitution. Nevertheless the rats were banished and the hair at Hahnemann though apparently less luxuriant than in the days when the rat was rampant is now absolutely germless.

McNab's Persuasiveness

When heirs fall out lawyers fall to and divide the spoils. That is what generally happens. It is believed to be almost unprofessional for lawyers to avert a contest when there is one in sight. The repudiation of opportunity by the attorneys for the Baldwin heirs may be conceived therefore to have occasioned a good deal of astonishment and not a little criticism among members of the bar. Not since the settlement of the Fair estate have such juicy pickings been offered to the legal profession. It seemed as though the will had been drawn for the purpose of provoking a contest. The widow and one daughter had been virtually disinherited. Nothing could stop them from breaking the will; nothing but an attorney with genius for compromise and a disposition to keep the estate as nearly intact as possible. This exceptional individual was found by the daughters to whom the bulk of the estate had been bequeathed. I am told that it was the fine Scotch hand of Gavin McNab that brought harmony into a situation that abounded in discords. With Garrett McEnerney and Henry T. Gage representing the widow and J. M. and H. L. Rothschild prepared to fight for Mrs. Selby, McNab realized that there was a pretty scrap ahead. It would have been to his interest of course to plunge into a contest, but he preferred to sit down and talk it over. This was agreeable to all hands. Propositions and counter-propositions were made and discussed, rejected and amended. At times fighting blood was up, but the persuasive McNab invariably succeeded in assuaging intemperate feelings and after several meetings the compromise was effected. All the heirs are jubilant over the outcome. Amiability reigns. The lawyers are the only ones that have lost by the compromise and they are as much elated as their clients.

Jack London's Breakdown

The vague rumors concerning the condition of Jack London, which have been floating northward ever since the Christmas holidays have crystallized into a definite report of complete physical breakdown and the compulsory abandonment of the voyage of the Snark, which has been laid up in one of the island harbors while the Londons took prosaic passage in the Mariposa for Sydney. It is more than probable that the early hardships of Jack London's life have undermined his constitution, and that it will be a long time, if ever, before he is able to resume an active life. Five serious afflictions, one of them requiring an operation, and two, mysterious nervous ailments which are said to baffle the skill of the Australian doctors, are credited to his lot, and making due allowance for exaggeration, he appears to have taken on a full cargo of misfortunes. The Snark is to be sold and the Londons are to return to San Francisco within a short while. Meanwhile, London has recovered sufficiently to be able to speak on his favorite topic of Socialism, and to find himself at variance with the labor leaders of the southern continent, who are not in sympathy with that cause.

The Quest of a Continent

Robert L. Cobbett, a member of the London Geographical Society, now touring the world, is an intimate friend of Lieutenant Shackleton who recently emerged from Antarctic regions with the distinction of having reached Farthest South. According to Mr. Cobbett one of the purposes of the Shackleton expedition was to learn whether King Edward VII Land and South Victoria Land are islands or peninsulas of the continent which is believed to cover the South polar region and to which the name Antarctic was given many years ago. British scientists are of the opinion that the south pole will be found in the middle of a continent larger than Europe. The existence of a continent has been reported, was once depicted on the maps, but the place where it was supposed to be has since been navigated by ships. "In addition to the motor car taken to the Antarctic," says Mr. Cobbett, "a novelty of the expedition was the Siberian ponies which were used instead of dogs. The drawing capacity of one of these tough beasts is as great as eighteen dogs."

De Young is Setting the Pace

In the haunts of newspapermen when shop is talked nowadays the new Chronicle comes in for a good share of discussion. By the new Chronicle is meant the morning journal into which Charley De Young has infused some of his individuality. It has begun to dawn on the perceptions of local journalists that the young manager of the Chronicle is an enthusiast in journalism with a passion for supremacy and with the essential instinct well developed. Though M. H. De Young is still the nominal proprietor of the Chronicle, his son has been the manager of the paper ever since the fire, and he has proved himself a hustler with talent for handling special editions and stimulating circulation. In the old days, or to be more precise in the days before the fire, the Chronicle was conservative in all its departments, but now its business office is setting the pace and its contemporaries are obliged to follow. As to the news department, it has become apparent to readers generally that if they really want to know what is going on in the city they must read the Chronicle. This was formerly true of the Examiner, but since the Heney shooting the monarch has been trying so hard to conciliate the civic patriots that it suppresses what news it does not color. And occasionally the Examiner takes its news straight from Burns, and occasionally from Judge Lawlor. The Judge's fine Italian hand was in evidence the other day when the Examiner printed an article with reference to the change of venue bill that must have been written in the Family Club. According to this article Judge Cabaniss is now of the Lawlor-Dunne brand of jurist. This is inconceivable. There is only one Dunne and only one Lawlor. When in the Newburg case the other day the fact was disclosed that the principal witness for the prosecution had been put on the city's payroll by the District Attorney the Examiner buried the sensational story on an inside page, but the Chronicle played it up on the front page. Thus did the timid monarch of the dailies propitiate the powers that be. In the old days of fearless and independent journalism the Examiner would have made this story of indecent intrigue shriek itself into the ears of startled readers; it would have been illustrated, freaked and scareheaded. But the monarch has been tamed and subdued.

The Bong Club Raid

Ah Sam, the unfortunate Chinese gambler who happened to be the first Mongolian arrested in the famous raid made on the Ah Bong Club, has a multiplicity of defences, any one of which he thinks would have stood him in good stead, had they been offered on his behalf.

First of all, Sam would like it to be understood that he and his countrymen were engaged in a quiet game of pinochle or Chinese bridge whist. That barricaded doors protected the club room where he made his headquarters was merely an incident. Blandly he asked, were not the doors of many of the fashionable club houses and exclusive homes where bridge whist was played constructed of oak or hickory? The most elaborate of the defences reserved in this Oriental bag of tricks is humorous, to say the least. It is commonly known that Chinese and Japanese are fond of nibbling at watermelon seed, and in the course of relaxation they will consume a large quantity of these relishes. It is also known that a short while ago fantan was played with beans, and that a bag of beans captured in a Chinese gambling raid and offered in the police court was accepted as prima facie evidence that gambling was being carried on. In the Bong Club raid there were no beans, but watermelon seed in abundance, the wily Ah Sam having made the substitution so that, in case of capture, he could claim that they were on the tables for the purpose of refreshment, or that they constituted a prescription especially prepared for the delectation of the guests and members of the club, and not at all for gambling purposes. The disagreement of the jury in Ah Sam's case brought a glow of satisfaction to the Chinese gamblers.

Her very fleshy suitor had managed to get upon his knees before her, and was panting out his proposal, when the telephone rang.

"Please," she suggested, "please stay still; I'll answer it and be right back!"

Where Were the Spotlight Heroes?

Have you noticed that none of the limelighters were conspicuous at any of the functions tendered to Ambassador Bryce? It has been remarked by those who take note of these trivial significancies that neither James D. Phelan nor Professor Boke were "among those present." If they were invited they did not attend; or if they did attend they were not placed in the glare of the central arc cluster. I don't think either of them was invited. I do not find their names in the list of invited guests at any of the Bryce affairs. I regard this omission as a presage of better conditions in this community and an evidence of returning good sense among those who arrange public honors for public men. Heretofore no event of public importance was complete without the eminent presence of James D. Phelan: and latterly Professor Boke has been poking himself forward so persistently that it has been almost impossible to avoid giving him a seat above the salt at all gatherings where men meet to discuss the community interests. Not that Phelan or Boke is an intellectual complement of an occasion of this kind; quite the contrary; but Phelan had become a bad habit and Boke had attained the dimensions of an acquired vice. I am glad, therefore, to observe that the habit is being abandoned and that the vice is curing itself in the usual way, being "a monster of such hideous mien that to be hated it needs only to be seen." I take it as a happy omen that Phelan and Boke have been apparently forgotten by those who assist the limelighters to the center of the stage.

The Keeper of Phelan's Conscience

PURE MILK FOR BABY

Sanitary milk production was first started by Gail Borden in the early 50s. The best systems today are largely based on his methods, but none are so thorough and so rigidly enforced as the Borden system. For over fifty years the Eagle Brand Condensed Milk has proved its claim as the best food for infants.

1907, the editor offered $6,000 for the information; but when Bowling demanded the guarantee of Spreckels that the money would be paid, Older offered him only the word of James D. Phelan. Now, why could not Older give the word of Spreckels? A variety of explanations are current among newspapermen elucidating this mystery. It is said that Spreckels prefers to give his own word in all matters involving the expenditure of money, and that he seldom trusts other men with his good faith in this regard. Some of the newspapermen who have known Older since he was a cub reporter and are also acquainted with the hereditary traits of Spreckels, are of the opinion that Spreckels would as soon think of trusting Older with his honor as with his promise to pay $6000 or any other sum down to a nickel. It is rather tough on Older but the editor of the Bulletin probably doesn't wince under the imputation, his varied experience having calloused him to such things. Anyway it is very clear that Older is not the keeper of Spreckels; that he does not carry the Spreckels power of attorney in his inside pocket; and that when anybody asks him for the Spreckels word that money will be paid for information favorable to the graft prosecution, Older is compelled to substitute the word of James D. Phelan, which, apparently, the editor of the longest leased Bulletin still holds in escrow.

In such places clerics illuminated missals for the glory of God and wrote down their pious thoughts for love of man, and in such places the lamp of learning was kept alive by sequestered monks through the Dark Ages. Gothic arches intercross above. Between their supporting columns rise curtain walls of old grey stones, against which stand ranks and ranks of books. cathedrals, the sort of lighting architects have struggled for as the ideal illumination of handsome interiors. Stairs in deep-paneled cases rise at either end to upper chambers, which at the stair heads look back into the main hall through windows of deep Gothic tracery, hand-carved in heavy timber and richly gilded. This treatment has also been applied to a hooded seat in the main room, and to a tall glazed teretory in the center of the floor, which will contain some of those treasures in porcelain, silver and turquoise, or jade and gold, that Elder shows from time to time. The dominant color is grey—not a cold grey but that solid and reassuring tone that things have a way of taking on when they have been a long time established. The ceiling runs into a somewhat livelier blue; and near the entrance is a recessed settle that furnishes the main color note—a warm, bold mass of royal red. In such a setting books become intimate. Here is the air of ripe scholarship and that sense of establishment and permanence in which alone the mind finds its time and chance. With such surroundings men once lived the life of the intellect instead of the cash-register; they associated with Plutarch and Aristippus and forget about tax time and the day the interest was due. In such places men like Abelard and Duns Scotus announced new systems of thought, and earnest students came and sat on their trusses of hay and the stone floors to hear. To create such an atmosphere beside the tide of traffic in a modern city might seem impossible, until one steps from the sidewalk of Grant avenue into the hush, the quiet, the almost churchly peace of "Elder's," senses the coolness and security of its grey walls and arches and the beauty and strength of its Gothic treatment, making a refuge but a refuge vital with the medieval spirit of work and service; and notes that the architect and the workman have wrought a perfect whole, consistent throughout, and without a suggestion of the haste and urgency of modern life. The place will be much discussed. It has distinction and will have its distinctive fame and that will add to the fame of San Francisco, for which every true San Franciscan will be grateful.

"Conservation in California"

That California intends to follow earnestly the movement started by President Roosevelt for the conservation of national resources is indicated in the announcement of the theme for the eleventh semi-annual meeting of the Counties Committee to be held under the auspices of The California Promotion Committee at Del Monte on May 8. "Conservation in California" is a subject of State-wide importance, one which will appeal equally to the lumberman of Humboldt, the miner of the Sierras, the viticulturist of Sonoma, the farmer of the great central valley, the citrus grower south of Tehachapi and the merchant and manufacturer of the metropolis. It is a question which concerns the prosperity and steady development of the whole commonwealth, and one of paramount importance at the present time. A large attendance from every one of the fifty-eight counties is expected. Papers will be read by such eminent authorities as Gifford Pinchot, chief forester of the United States; F. H. Newell, director of the Reclamation Service and Dr. W. J. McGee, secretary of the Inland Water Ways Commission and by those familiar with conditions in California that bear upon the matter. The Committee meetings are notable in that they are not simply educational but lead to tangible results, a committee being appointed at each meeting to carry out the purposes of the Counties Committee as expressed in the resolutions adopted. As an instance of this, the recent investigation and report by the legislative hold-over committee which studied the conditions and needs of the harbors of California was the consummation of a movement initiated at the sixth semi-annual meeting of the Counties Committee held at San Diego in December, 1906. Despite the strict attention given to business during the sessions of these meetings it is not forgotten that one of their beneficial purposes is in giving people from different parts of the State opportunities to become better acquainted with each other and with the attractions of sections other than those in which they live.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks

The past week has shown new high records for many Wall Street stocks. Union Pacific has been the market leader with Steel Common a close second. The underlying strength makes itself apparent whenever the market becomes weak, sufficient support invariably turning the tide. Harriman is again at his New York office. It may turn out that his stay in the West was for the purpose of working out some gigantic undertaking instead of altogether for health reasons. The barometer points to some radical changes in transportation conditions. There has been unusual activity in the Gould shares of late, giving evidence of support by insiders. A very large amount of money is being spent in improvements to all Gould lines, preparing for the increased business that will come to these roads as soon as the Western Pacific is in operation. Hawley and Keene are most prominent on the buying side of D. & R. G. Common. Keene predicts that common stocks will sell at 80. The new Coast Extension of the St. Paul Ry. having been completed its securities should soon seek a higher level. On the whole the ear-marks of a runaway bull market are in evidence. Under such conditions it is useless to specialize as the good and bad stocks go together. It is well to remember no one ever went broke taking reasonable profits. I believe in taking on commitments only of a first-class character and keeping out of stocks of doubtful value that look enticing because they are low. Cheap stocks or in other words (low priced stocks) are a more hazardous investment than those of high value. The present bullish sentiment will probably last well into May when crop conditions will cause a halting and no doubt a declining tendency will prevail during the summer months. The tariff reduction has lost its effect and will cause but little market interest hereafter.

Grain

It was a big week for the wheat trade as prices had a further advance of three cents for July and four cents for May reaching high point at Saturday's session. There was some bearish features to be considered each day during the week. These were chiefly in the way of liberal receipts, spring wheat at Northwest markets, primary movement of wheat largely in excess of corresponding day a year ago. The bears took courage to sell some wheat short and got in trouble. The longs took profits at times. But the bulk of the news for the week was of a positively bullish character and this was reflected in excellent buying day after day and a number of strong swells in the market which were followed by very moderate reactions. According to local authority no such prices have ever been made for July wheat in the month of April in past 18 years. Cool weather has been unfavorable for the start of the winter crop. Winter killing reports combine to come extensively from Iowa, Indiana, Illinois and Nebraska. Mills all over the Southwest are paying such fancy prices for old wheat and supplies are so light that it looks as if a milling demand for the new wheat in July will prevent much of it getting to Chicago to fill contracts. This makes July an old crop month and apparently there is nothing to prevent July wheat having such advance as that already recorded for May.

Cotton

The Cotton Market the past week has shown a tower of strength; advances steadily on an average of ten to fifteen points per day with only small profit taking setbacks in evidence from time to time. The week-end figures were again bullish, the visible supply showing another large decrease and the into-sight movement a substantial decrease when compared with either of the two previous years. The statistical position of cotton not only of American but of all kinds, is gradually working into a stronger position. The stock of certificate cotton in New York has been losing on an average of one thousand bales per day since the first of March, bringing the total down to 81,000 bales. The same ratio of loss for the next thirty days would mean a stock available for deliveries of less than 50,000 bales and the probability that Southern prices as a consequence would be much further away from parity with contracts. It is worth considering the position of July shorts with the prospect of the stock being still further reduced because of no way of attracting or forcing further shipments to New York. According to Consul Thomas H. Norton of Chemnitz, the feeling in the textile circles of Germany is one of confidence and the outlook is fair for a normal year's business during 1909. The pessimistic trade reports from England are being accepted with a large grain of salt, as they do not harmonize with the continued heavy takings of American cotton by the English Mills. That trade conditions in textiles in this country are all that could be expected and are steadily improving there can be no question. In a recent review of the iron trade, "The Iron Age," says: "The only business of consequence done lately has been in New England, where the makers of textile machinery who are busy have been the principal buyers." Developments as regards new crop preparations have shown but slight improvement. Texas has received light rains at some points which have helped conditions, but is still without the general heavy precipitation which is needed. Sooner or later Cotton will go much higher. All articles of produce are high. Even Coffee, which was a drug in the market, has advanced considerably. With speculative help in Cotton restricted, important changes in prices will come suddenly and in jumps. The only policy to follow, therefore, is to take a stand and protect one's engagements and await the issue. Some improvement in trade, or fears about the new crop will soon start an upward movement, and when the world wants to buy, it will be considered that investment purchases of new crops have absorbed so much that the advance will be sharp and sustained. We recommend purchases on all weak markets now, while the article is still cheap.

Plebeian Restaurant Attracts a Count

Count Jeoffrey D'abbans, attached to the local French consulate, has been discovered dining in the Fior d'Italia, a restaurant in the Barbary Coast district which caters to the taste of the peasant Italians and to those half-way epicureans desirous of tasting strange fare. "How shocking!" it has been remarked, that a real French Count should desert the Laurel Court of the Fairmont for the greasy-walled eating house on the "coast," which is patronized by hard-working, perspiring Italians. Can it be that a badly depleted wallet, and not a change of fare or a penchant for Bohemianism has been the determining factor? But then, a real Count—there must be some attraction not insistently apparent, and as the corollary to curiosity is the gratification of it, the next move will be to forget the shock in the interest of investigation, and the chances are that the Fior d'Italia will become the Mecca for the would-be Bohemians. And the probability is they will find something worth while, for a Frenchman can discern good cooking as far as he can smell it.

Where Divorce is Easy

Reno, Nev., has been discovered by New York's Four Hundred. A correspondent writes me that several representatives of the Gotham smart set are establishing a residence in Reno for the purpose of getting out of bondage. The one who is likely to be the first to obtain the desired decree is Mrs. Maturin L. Delafield, formerly the beautiful Lettice Lee Sands. She says that her husband deserted her in Paris. As she is rich in her own right she asks neither for alimony nor the costs of suit. Mrs. Delafield is not lonesome in Reno. She is accompanied by her mother and she sees a good deal of Mrs. Henry Spies Kip who is living out the six months which she must spend in Nevada before she obtains the privileges of a resident. The Kips are of Newport where they have done a lot of entertaining. Mrs. Kip attracted attention to herself a few years ago by giving a baby party at which the guests wore bibs, aprons and pinafores. A little later she gave society a surprise by announcing that she was going on the stage. She went abroad and studied awhile for grand opera but she never broke into the profession.

Mrs. Oelrich and the Fairmont

The visit of Mrs. Theresa Fair Oelrich of New York to San Francisco is full of significance and the promise of splendid improvement in the palatial Fairmont. It will be remembered that she was the original owner and builder. The Fairmont stands on property formerly occupied by the Fair home, than which no more superb location can be found in the world, so there was something of sentiment as well as business in the decision which prompted Mrs. Oelrich to build the beautiful marble palace known as the Fairmont on the site of her early home. Shortly before the fire she exchanged the incomplete hotel building for down town business property. At the time of the fire the building was completely gutted though left structurally unimpaired. The Law Brothers, who were then its owners, in their haste to have the hotel open for business within a year after the fire, did not take the time to replace the exquisite marble columns which had been chipped and marred during the days of disaster, but had them filled in and rounded out with a composition closely resembling the original stone, and let it go at that. When Mrs. Oelrich reversed her former deal and the Fairmont was again in her hands, she leased it to the Palace Hotel Company while the new Palace was building, and they have operated it with their usual success ever since. Now Mrs. Oelrich is planning to complete the Fairmont as it was originally designed. At an expense of many thousand dollars the Scagiola pillars will be replaced with others of real Italian marble. Mrs. Oelrich has held several consultations with Colonel John C. Kirkpatrick and it is highly probable that when

A Living Picture

The friends of Mrs. Willie K. Vanderbilt Jr. who were recently compassionating her as a result of newspaper report to the effect that her husband was indulging in the luxury of an affinity, will be pleased to learn that she appears to be as gay as ever and free from all symptoms of domestic infelicity. A friend writes me that she was the hit of the recent fashionable entertainment given in New York for the benefit of the Lisa Day Nursery. This entertainment was given by Mrs. Vanderbilt and she appeared as one of the living pictures. In front of a Bedouin tent reclined Mrs. Vanderbilt, the Sphinx and the familiar pyramids filling in a dim back ground. On a stone altar by her side burned the sacred fire of Osiris. A golden harp lay at her feet. Black gauze, glinting with silver, swept away from Mrs. Vanderbilt's bared shoulders. Below her bare ankles she wore sandals, bound about the ankles with thongs of leather. About her forehead was a heavy bandeau of diamonds and chains of diamonds fell from sprays in her hair over her ears. She was an Egyptian woman worth a king's ransom.

A Queer Joke

Society was somewhat startled Thursday morning over the report that Mrs. Oscar Cooper had died suddenly at her home in Burlingame. No one seems to know how the rumor originated, but before nine o'clock all the details were in hand—complications resulting from grippe—very sudden,—terribly sad—family greatly distressed, etc. Several sympathetic friends rang up the houses of the near relatives and tendered their condolences. It was from the Coopers senior that the first denial came. They said "It can't be true, for at eleven last night Oscar rang up his father to arrange for a fishing expedition," but nevertheless, the story continued to circulate, and was the one hushed topic discussed over the teacups. Meanwhile, Mrs. Cooper, blissfully unconscious of her early demise, was entertaining a houseful of lively friends who were with her for the polo season, and looked ready for anything but a funeral. Now that it has proved such a canard, there is not much genuine amusement among those who were sorrowful, and everyone is wondering when, where and how the story originated, as well as how it circulated so rapidly. As Thursday was the first of April the probability is that there is an individual in society who regards it as a masterly stroke of genius to fabricate the report of a woman's death.

A Dispute That Enlivened a Bridge Game

Apparently the rule of strict silence while a bridge game is in progress is not a law of one of the new bridge clubs. There are about a dozen members, amongst them some very young matrons, and the animated conversation which took place the other day was carried on in tones loud enough to engage the attention of the players at other tables who neglected their cards to listen to the spirited dialogue. One young matron made a play which another disputed. "You can't do that," said she; "Russell says they never play that way at the club. It isn't correct." "Well," was the reply, "Roy is every bit as good a player, and he says it is all right." "Russell knows, and he says it isn't," and so on it went, like the immortal "Katydid chorus." Instead of trying to pour oil on the troubled waters the remaining members of the coterie added fuel to fire, and whenever there seemed a likelihood of the flame dying out they gave it a dextrous prod. Neither of the combatants was willing to let the other have the last word, as it was, but somehow a peace was patched up.

A Spanish Picnic

A novel entertainment, in the form of a Spanish picnic and barbecue under the trees near the Potter Country Club and Hope Ranch, was enjoyed by the southern contingent of the guests at the Hotel Potter. It was given by Colonel Jack Harrington in honor of Mrs. John McMullin, Miss Eliza McMullin, Mrs. J. D. Peters and Miss Anna Peters of Stockton and southern people in general who are at the hotel. The party left the Potter at eleven in the morning and were transported to the ground in tally-hos. Dinner was served at rustic tables at precisely half past twelve, consisting of the barbecued meats fresh from the pit close at hand and garnished with Spanish sauces accompanied by hot bread. The afternoon was spent in a ramble on the beach and at the club house of the Potter Country Club, where an im-

A Noisy Group at a Swell Concert

There is to be only one more concert this season under the auspices of the St. Francis Musical Art Society, but the winter's series has proved so successful that the directors have decided to carry out their schemes for next year on an even more elaborate scale. Every concert given has been attended by the socially elect and the audiences have been very enthusiastic. Last Wednesday's concert was the only exception. It was well attended and the gowning was beautiful, but there was a lack of the usual air of smart alertness. Possibly this was due to the absence of the Burlingame set, who were taken up with the polo season, the informal entertainments and the house parties down the peninsula. As far as numbers are concerned they were not missed, for the ball room was crowded to the limit of its capacity. Ossip Gabrielowitsch was at his best, but there was an unfortunate lack of appreciation and the effect of his playing was marred by the low murmur of talking and laughing amongst the audience. One box party was very noisy. Its members evidently attended only to see and be seen, and if they heard one note of the music it was surely by accident. They seemed to have a delightful time all by themselves, and were as much discussed by the rest of the audience as was the music and the performers. The concert was all the more enjoyable because of the welcome to Mrs. Ben Lathrop. She was personally known to many of the audience, and the comments passed along were most complimentary. "New York has done wonders for her," said one critic. "She is improved in every way; she is twice as pretty as she ever was, and has twice as good a stage presence, and her voice is wonderfully better." The applause accorded her was most enthusiastic in spite of a certain deadliness in the atmosphere, in keeping with the penitential season, perhaps, but not otherwise with the occasion.

The Beringer Musical Club

The eleventh piano and vocal recital of the Beringer Musical Club will be given on the evening of April 21, under the direction of Professor and Mme. Joseph Beringer at Century Hall. The well arranged program includes several novelties and promises to be of general interest. Miss Estella McNeil, Miss Irene De Martini, Mr. Melton Mowbray, Mrs. Agnes Burrell, Miss Frances Westinghouse, Miss Anna Fritz, Miss Alta Yocom, and Miss Anita Morse will be the participants.

In the Social Spotlight

A quiet home wedding was celebrated at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. P. G. Galpin on Gough street on Thursday, March 25th, when their eldest daughter, Miss Frances, became the bride of Peter Lint. The officiating clergyman was the Rev. Bradley of Trinity Church.

Miss Genevieve Harvey came up from Del Monte for a week's stay with her grandmother, Mrs. Eleanor Martin. Mrs. Harvey and her daughter have made their home at Del Monte for the last two years, Mr. Harvey going down for the week ends.

Mrs. Alexander McCracken was hostess at a delightful tea at the Fairmont on Saturday last, her guest of honor being Mrs. Randolph Harrison, formerly a resident of San Francisco.

One of the pleasantest teas of the week was given by Mrs. E. K. Johnson, wife of Dr. Johnson, U. S. A., at their quarters in the Presidio.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Josselyn will leave this month for Paris, where they will make a lengthy stay. Miss May and Miss Marjorie Josselyn will not accompany their parents, having

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Johnson came over from San Rafael to attend the Gabrielowitsch concert and spend a few days at the St. Francis.

EMANUEL SANITARIUM

Capital which recognizes California's opportunities has turned aside from "Industrials" and invested, for the benefit of ailing humanity, in curative springs, rolling acres, woodland, and glade in old Sonoma where, near Glen Ellen, it is rapidly preparing a sanitarium which is bound to attract deserved attention. Pessimistic critics will of course sneer at the thought of capital being invested for the good of humanity, especially of ailing humanity. Admitting that dollars so invested will bring more dollars in return; if, in the process, opportunities are given for the sick to find health, and for the struggle-worn business or professional man to find rest and relaxation, thereby lengthening his term of years and his service to mankind it would seem to one of fairly optimistic temperament that they were mighty useful dollars. Since the days when the Indians had everything their own way in the Golden State; hundreds of years before the Spanish padres journeyed into Alta California; undoubtedly before the social call which Cortez paid to Montezuma, the aborigines found cure for many of their ills in the various springs which bubble up from the hillside at Glen Ellen. The nature of the waters had undergone no change, neither has the nature of man except toward artificiality. What was sauce for the Piute is logically sauce at the present time for his white brother. So positive are the new owners of the properties at Glen Ellen that Nature as they have found her there, aided by medical skill as they purpose introducing it, will cure the ills of the flesh they have come out with a statement that certain cases will be received for treatment with a guaranteed cure, else at no cost to the patient. They have arranged to have the sanitarium, which from its prevailing color they have called the "White City," conducted along the lines of the Emanuel Movement which is receiving so much attention at present and regarding which one of its leading exponents from Boston has so recently enlightened the people of San Francisco from the lecture platform and from the pulpit. Every true lover of California believes it is the State of all the Union to live in and to that axiom is to be added that it is the State to get well in, and that its northern boundary is not marked by the Tehachapi either.

Legends of Easter Flowers

At no other festival do flowers play so important a part as at Easter. Coming, coincident with the Resurrection, in early spring, after the dark winter months, they are eminently appropriate and symbolic of the occasion. Chief among the Easter blossoms has always been the lily, and in less favored climes than California, flower lovers bend all their efforts towards forcing their potted callas to bloom for that day. The Easter lily, so tradition states, was once called the Persian Beauty, but as the Virgin plucked and held it in her hand the yellow changed to white. But the Buddhist finds a sacred type in the lotus, the lily of consolation, and with the Romans the flower was dedicated to Juno. The Arab cherishes the lily and from Egypt to China, in some form or other, it is held in reverence. There is a tradition that Judith was crowned with lotus lilies when she entered the tent to slay Holofernes. In the Madonna pictures by the old masters there are frequently three lilies on one stem, typifying the Trinity, the three theological virtues of Faith, Hope and Charity, or the Annunciation conception and birth of the Savior. There is a pretty Spanish legend which accounts for the first appearance of the lily on the earth though unfortunately for even a semblance of veracity, the flower was known for long ages before there were either monasteries or abbots. The story is that a kind-hearted abbot, pitying a poor, half-witted lad, gave him shelter in the cloister and tried to teach him the rudiments of religion. The boy could neither understand nor remember the holy lore, but gentleness and patience endeared him to the brotherhood. Noticing that when the day's tasks were ended he slipped away to the church, they watched him and found that though he could not recall even the simplest prayer, he knelt and repeated. "I believe in God; I hope for God; I love God." One day they missed him and the seekers found him lying dead, with his hands crossed above his heart, on the floor of his stone cell. He was buried quietly in a graveyard near Seville, and the words he had said so often were carved on a rude cross placed above his grave. Next morning one of the monks went to the spot and found blooming above it the most beautiful flower he had ever seen. They opened the grave and found that the first lily that ever grew on earth had its roots in the heart of the boy.

There is a legend that the lily of the valley had its origin in the drops of the Virgin's milk which fell on the ground. In some parts of rural England the flower is called "ladder of heaven."

The daffodil, sometimes called the "Dis lily" and "lent lily," according to tradition, sprung up from the seeds dropped from Pluto's chariot as he was abducting Proserpine. There is a superstition still surviving amongst the peasantry that to pluck the first daffodil of the season is to court death. If a blossom is brought into the house no luck may be expected for the remainder of the year. The legend of misfortune attending the gathering of early spring blossoms, which appears to be wide spread and general, has been perhaps all that has saved whole species from extermination.

The brier rose is according to some legendary lore, the plant from which the crown of thorns was woven.

The iris is associated by tradition with Easter. It grows in every part of the world and has the significance of a universal message. The Greeks named it from the azure-winged messenger of the gods and the Egyptians placed it on the brow of the Sphynx and the scepters of their rulers. It was amongst the irises that the rush cradle of the infant Moses was hidden. It is the fleur de lys—the lily of France, but its place as an Easter flower comes from the legend that it was an agonized witness of the crucifixion and that when the anguished cry 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me!' was heard, it made a solemn vow: "Henceforth I will perpetually mourn, and lest men should ever lose sight of this solemn hour, above my golden chalice I will carry a veil of violet."

The common little garden pest the red leaved trefoil, sheep sorrel, the "Allelulia" of the Italians, is said to have grown at the foot of the cross and to have had its green leaves changed to crimson by the blood of the Savior.

The Passion flower has derived its name from the fanciful coincidence that its five anthers correspond to the five wounds; the triple style to the three nails, the center receptacles to the pillars of the cross and the calyx to the nimbus of glory.

It is a Bohemian tradition that Judas hanged himself on a willow tree, hence it has a peculiar attraction for suicides. The willow is also credited with having furnished material for the scourges, and to have droped its branches in sorrow ever since. In Scotland the dwarf birch is believed to be stunted because of the evil use to which it was put. In those regions where the willow is of evil repute children and young animals are never whipped with willow sprouts, lest their growth be stopped.

The elder is sometimes held in disrepute as being the tree from which Judas suspended himself, but there are other traditions that because it was of the elder wood that the cross was made, it is never struck by lightning The ash and the oak are also mentioned as having furnished wood for the cross. In Russia the trembling of the Aspen is said to be in memory of that great crime, while in Lithuania it is credited with the lesser evil of having refused to bow when the Savior passed on his way to execution.

There is another tradition, that the cross was made of a cedar tree cut by Solomon and buried in a spot afterwards covered by the pool of Bethseda. At the time of the Passion the wood floated and was seized by the Jews out of which to build the cross. Older traditions have it that there were four species of wood made use of.

A Californian's Play

The Eastern Bureau of the California Promotion Committee, which is alert in obtaining information concerning all that reflects credit on the State, has noted the success of another California playwright, Robert H. Davis, in "The Family," which had its first production in Kansas City under the personal direction of Henry Miller. It is very simple, as the author says. "It's all about a family of five people, very poor and of little consequence. They are struggling along in an aimless sort of way; the eldest daughter, having the liveliest imagination of the five, craves a little liberty and experience. A traveling minstrel show comes to the village and the girl falls in love with the drum major whose splendor dazzles her. She runs away and joins him on the road and the blow threatens to disintegrate the family which is none too firmly united at best. The mother follows and finds the hawk that has robbed her nest. She brings the girl home again, and in this way the family is bound together through Christian forgiveness for the girl. The splendid courage and devotion of the mother awaken the shiftless father and worthless son to a realization of the responsibilities of life, and the household is saved to good citizenship and domestic unity. In the main the object is to show what a good mother can do when she wills. The mother saves them all. She represents the countless every-day sacrifices and triumphs of domestic life for which mothers seldom get proper credit. The play, if I may say it, was written with the object of rendering to the mothers of all men the homage which is their due. My own mother was the inspiration. It isn't all she is entitled to but it is the best I can do."

Samuel's Strong Play

The writing on the Magic Skin, as Balzac stated it in "Peau du Chagrin," was: "Possessing me thou shalt possess all things. But thy life is mine, for God has so willed it. Wish, and thy wishes shall be fulfilled, but measure thy desires according to the life which is in thee. This is thy life. With each wish I must shrink even as thy own days." With this as his text Maurice V. Samuels has written a play, "The Conflict," which was produced to a crowded house at the Garden Theatre, New York, on March 29, and made a profound impression. As Samuels tells the story, De Valentin, played by Robert Drouet, has reached the end of his resources, and decides to accept the magic skin with its conditions. He wishes earnestly that the woman without a soul shall love him with all the ardor that he has loved her for ten years, and whom now he wishes to hate with an equal intensity. He also makes a flippant wish that the antiquarian, whose sole desire and pleasure in life is knowledge shall fall in love with a ballet girl. His wishes are fulfilled, but he pays the price in mental and physical suffering, and The Conflict is the struggle between the woman without a soul and the woman of purity, devotion and self sacrifice, for the life and soul of the man whom they both love.

The Etlin Recital

A large and enthusiastic audience enjoyed a rare musical treat last Sunday afternoon at Century Hall, when M. Henri Etlin, the talented young French pianist, gave a recital. The program consisted entirely of the works of French composers, several of which were heard here for the first time. M. Etlin, who has already become a favorite with music lovers in San Francisco, gave a most perfect rendition of his well selected program. He possesses a wonderful technic, and a beautiful touch, combined with a poetic temperament, and his interpretations are as intellectual as they are brilliant. Lovers of artistic performances will watch for the announcement of his next appearance.

America's most popular hero, the man who, with loaded pistol, dared the surgeons to amputate his legs after he had been thrice wounded at Fort Fisher in the Civil War, the man who, with one small gunboat threatened to engage the whole Chilean navy when that country was insulting Americans, the man that brought sixteen battleships around South America without a hitch and delivered them to his successor in better condition than when they started out, and who has done a hundred other notable things less well known but just as interesting, Admiral Robley D. Evans will be the center of attraction during the coming week, when he will tell of his experiences in the straight-forward, interesting manner which has made him the most successful lecturer in the country. Manager Greenbaum announces that he has engaged the Admiral for two of the lectures, which will be delivered in Dreamland Rink, the first on Wednesday night, April 14, on the subject, "From Hampton Roads to San Francisco," and the second on Sunday afternoon, April 19, on "The War with Spain." Wherever these lectures have been given the papers have exhausted their vocabulary of adjectives in praise of his dramatic, interesting and diverting entertainment. Seats may be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s after Monday next, at 9 a. m. On Monday night, April 19, Admiral Evans will appear in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Manager Bishop having consented to lay off his entire stock company in honor of the national hero. The subject will be "The Voyage of the Fleet."

Skinner in "The Honor of the Family"

San Francisco always awards a warm welcome to Otis Skinner on each visit and his admirers here are legion. Mr. Skinner is one of the most interesting of contemporary actors, and one of the most popular, too. He has made his mark in comedy and in romantic drama. Recently he has devoted his fine talents to the exemplification of the higher forms of modern stage art. He will be seen here at the Van Ness Theatre, Easter week, under Charles Frohman's direction in his own play, "The Honor of the Family" which enjoyed a long run in New York last year at the beautiful Hudson Theatre. So pronounced was the success of the play in the metropolis, and so admirably suited to Mr. Skinner's personality is the central role of the Bonapartist hero, that Manager Frohman unquestionably made a happy choice and exercised uncommon judgment in securing the rights of the play from the French author, M. Emile Fabre, as a vehicle for Mr. Skinner. His supporting company is headed by Miss Percy Haswell, who herself has been a conspicuous star in the dramatic firmament in recent seasons, and made a deep and powerful impression in the new role, as her part is exceptionally strong and individual. Frederick Sargent, one of the handsomest and most magnetic of leading men, and that rare character artist, A. G. Andrews, who was with Richard Mansfield for fifteen years, are also prominent in Mr. Skinner's company. "The Honor of the Family" promises to be a genuine boon to appreciative theatregoers who are tired of the trash and inanity of the majority of present-day productions.

"Under Two Flags"

The management of the Alcazar are confident that their forthcoming production of "Under Two Flags" will be the most stupendous achievement ever undertaken by a stock theatre. In addition to the twenty-eight speaking parts, a host of extras have been engaged, and to prepare the inanimate accessories the Alcazar's artistic and mechanical resources have been taxed to their limit. The painters, carpenters and electricians have been busy for the past month constructing the eight "sets" of scenery that are shown in the five acts. As to the play itself, no stronger drawing card could be offered for Easter week, for it appeals to every variety of theatrical taste. Dramatized from Ouida's novel of the same name, (and she never wrote a story more popular), it gives in condensed and intensified form the most interesting of the incidents of the book. The central character is the Honorable Bertie Cecil, an English officer, forced by untoward circumstances to abandon the British flag and serve under the French tricolor in Algiers. A gallant soldier, he wins the admiration of his new comrades and the love of Cigarette, the impetuous vivandiere of the regiment. The chief interest hinges upon her attachment, which he never appreciates until she has forfeited her life to preserve his, but there is abundance of other elements to lend variety to the scenes. The action takes place in France and in Algiers, and the scenes show a bric-a-brac shop in Rouen; the winter garden of a chateau near the same city; the "Cabash of Algiers," the "Castle of Cigarette," an Algerian villa, the Bildah fort and the Chellala gorge. Evelyn Vaughan will play Cigarette. In the fourth act she leaps upon the back of a spirited horse and dashes up a rocky defile, and wherever this scene has been presented it has not failed to thrill spectators. Bertram Lytell is cast for Cecil, and all the Alcazar favorites have congenial roles. It is confidently believed that in Cigarette Miss Vaughan will present the most impressive character portrayal she has yet offered to San Francisco audiences. She is a most versatile actress.

The Big Easter Festival

This Easter Sunday afternoon, April 11, at Dreamland Rink, Will L. Greenbaum will give the big Easter Musical Festival for which preparations and rehearsals have been going on for weeks. On this occasion the famous Russian pianist, Ossip Gabrielowitsch, will make his farewell appearance, playing the beautiful "Concerto" for piano and orchestra by Chopin (E minor) besides two solo numbers, Rubinstein's "Barcarolle" and Liszt's "Venezia e Napoli." It has been so many years since our music lovers have heard a great pianist with orchestral accompaniment that this alone should attract a large audience, but there are so many other good things on this occasion. Miss Elsa Thornsvard, from the Royal Grand Opera in Elberfeld, will sing the brilliant waltz aria from Gounod's opera, "Mireille," the work with which she made her debut in opera. She is a San Francisco girl who has climbed the ladder of success and is now a prima donna. Then there will be the combined Cecilia clubs of Oakland and San Francisco, numbering over a hundred singers, with the Festival Symphony Orchestra in several splendid choral numbers. The Symphony Orchestra under Paul Steindorff, with William Hoffman and Gino Severi as concert masters, will play Mendelssohn's dramatic overture "Fingal's Cave," and the three dances from "Nell Gwynne," by Edward German, in addition to furnishing the many accompaniments. Seats for this exceptional concert may be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, corner of Kearny and Sutter streets, and on Sunday at the rink. Prices range from $1.50 to 75 cents, including reserved seats, which is very moderate for such an offering, comparing favorably, as it does, with any festival program ever given in this country.

New Musical Comedy at the Princess

The Princess offers an exceptionally strong attraction next Monday evening in the baseball musical comedy, "The Umpire," which proved one of the greatest theatrical successes in the history of New York. The action of the play takes place in Tangier, Morocco, at a period when no extradition treaty existed between that country and the other nations of the world. This condition of affairs made it possible for fugitive criminals to reside in Morocco without danger of being arrested and deported to their native land for punishment. Will H. Hough and Frank R. Adams, who are responsible for the libretto and lyrics, have constructed an exceedingly diverting story which abounds in surprising complications and affords a program of great enjoyment. Joseph E. Howard has written some very pretty music. Fred Mace will appear as Jimmie Dolan, the umpire, which he played in the original production. May Boley will have a splendid opportunity as Maribel Lewton, daughter of an absconding member of the Beef Trust. Helen Darling will make her reappearance and will have a congenial role as Lady Stella Bridghton Fitzhugh, an English woman who is sojourning in Morocco for reasons best known to herself. "The Umpire" will be staged by that peerless director Edward P. Temple who promises a superlative presentation of which the Princess Beauty Chorus will be an alluring feature.

PETER AND NANA IN "PETER PAN"
Which will be staged in splendid style at the Valencia Theatre.

The Newest Prodigy

Mischa Elman, the greatest marvel in the musical world, will be the opening attraction at the Garrick Theatre (the present Orpheum), at Ellis and Fillmore streets. This young Russian lad is recognized throughout the world not as a prodigy or wonder-child, but as a deep, learned and phenomenal violinist and musician. The very fact that he has played such masterpieces as the Brahms, Beethoven, Bach and Tschaikowsky violin concertos with the Berlin Philharmonic, Boston Symphony and Russian Symphony Orchestras would stamp him as a genius and a master, for the ordinary violin prodigy does not attempt such classics. The success of Elman in this country has been paralleled only by the first tour of Paderewski. Hundreds have been unable to secure admittance to the big concert halls of the east, and the same has been the case in Berlin and London. His management tried to have the California contract set aside on account of the great demands for extra concerts in the east, but Greenbaum insisted on having it fulfilled. There will be three concerts here, the date being Tuesday night, April 20, Thursday night, April 22, and Sunday afternoon, April 25. Among the numbers he will play are the "Symphonie Espagnol,' by Lalo and the Concertos by Mendelssohn and Saint-Saens.

"Peter Pan" at the Valencia

The Valencia Theatre will remain closed until Easter Sunday afternoon, when, after weeks of careful rehearsal and painstaking preparation, "Peter Pan," J. M. Barrie's delightful fantasy, will be presented for the first time in San Francisco by a stock company. The Realm of Fancy, of delicate humorous fancy, is the country chosen by the author for "Peter Pan," though he has called it "The Never, Never Land." Rather the Ever, Ever Land of childhood's imagination where "make believe" was once a joyous reality to us all, and is now to the little ones around us, and always will exist where happy children and the child spirit may be. "Peter Pan" will serve to introduce the Valencia's new leading lady, Harriet Worthington, who will appear in the title role, and in addition to all the favorites of the stock company a large number of new faces, particularly of children will be seen. Little Zena Kiefe, a child actress of great renown in the East, will appear, and the three Walter children, who have just concluded an engagement in the Los Angeles presentation of the play, have been brought to San Francisco for the production.

Norman Hackett in "Classmates"

Sissieretta Jones, the "Black Patti," and her "Troubadours" will appear for the last times at the American Theatre this Saturday afternoon and evening and at the Sunday matinee Norman Hackett, the popular young actor, will begin a week's engagement in Wm. C. DeMille and Margaret Turnbull's great play, "Classmates." This young star will make his first appearance here in modern character. He has already won for himself an enviable position in the classic drama and will be remembered with pleasure for his fine work with Louis James, Frederick Warde, E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe when he gained experience such as few of our young actors have had. It has led him logically and surely to the high position he now occupies. The enthusiasm with which "Classmates" has been received this season is not at all irrational, if all reports of the production are verified when the play is presented at the American. It

What to Wear, When and Where

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

WEAR A FROCK COAT ON EASTER SUNDAY

Easter Sunday is the dividing line in matters of dress. Styles of yesterday are no more permissible, and Dame Fashion with her new mandates reigns supreme not only for this day of days but for the days of the coming season. For this day, one of the most prominent holidays in the year, the frock coat or "Prince Albert" is without doubt the coat to wear. During the past year the morning coat or oxford grey cutaway, which, despite its name, is not confined to forenoon hours, has been worn at many a fashionable and notable wedding. This coat, therefore, bids fair to rival the more stately frock coat, but as yet does not hold so high a place in the scheme of dress. It cannot, however, be approved as a substitute for the frock for cermonious service. When the necessity exists it is the best substitute. While on the subject of the frock coat, if worn for weddings the best man, ushers and bridegroom should dress exactly alike. A fad that has found some favor is to have the attendants wear pearl grey or delicately tinted cravats and gloves. It is the bridegroom's privilege to determine what scheme of dress shall prevail and having advised his best man and ushers it is their duty to abide by his decision. The bridegroom provides the cravats and gloves for his best man and ushers. This he does through the haberdasher, who must have suitably engraved cards requesting them to call at his shop. The frock coat and cutaway require the same hat, collar, shirt, halfhose and shoes as the dress suit. The cravat, however, should be an "Ascot" or "Imperial" scarf, white or pearl. The waistcoat, white or pearl grey, high cut. The gloves, grey, glace kid to match the cravat in shade. If a nice day no coat is necessary, otherwise the Chesterfield is proper. It is permissible to wear a wing collar and four in hand with the cutaway, but these are not sanctioned by usage to accompany the frock coat, particularly at weddings.

Now, when orchards are blossoming, you should ride through the Santa Clara Valley and among the foothills. Interurban electric cars leave Broad Gauge Depot, San Jose, for Campbell, Los Gatos, Saratoga, Congress Springs and Cupertino.

at a ball after to pass through the rooms parading the queen of the evening.

"During the walk I incited her, by my attentions, to talk a great deal and two or three times made her laugh and answer in a mirthful tone. In the hot-house we stopped before a rare flower, a double jasmine, and, praising its perfume, I begged her to put a spray in my buttonhole. She did so, declaring that I was very fanciful; and while she was putting the flower in its place with her still well rounded fingers, I looked deep into her eyes with a gratitude both smiling and—I do not know how to express it, I was about to say ardent. At any rate, I looked at her with I know not what, that made her lower her eyes.

"She returned from the excursion somewhat fatigued and went upstairs to dress for dinner. During the meal I still endeavored to entertain her and did not allow the conversation to languish for a moment. After the dessert I again offered her my arm and she had taken it to pass on to the drawing-room when the chaplain, in surprise, reminded her that thanks had not yet been given. We prayed, and when we were at last in the drawing-room I seated myself at the side of the Duchess and imperceptibly led her to talk of her youth, of her triumphs. When she told that at a ball at the house of Montijo's she wore a rose-colored dress sprinkled over with jasmines I exclaimed, as though involuntarily: 'With jasmines!' How beautiful you must have been!' She turned away her head. There was an electrified silence of a few seconds and I noticed that she drew her breath with some difficulty."

"Upon retiring to my room I recalled the events of the day and I must confess that I grew alarmed. I saw in perspective the ridiculous possibilities of a situation which, thus far, had been so unique, charming and correct, and I determined to leave in time to catch the train for Bayonne which passed at dawn. No sooner said than done. I sprang from my bed, dressed, went down to the stables and ordered the break, and left a note for the duchess presenting my excuses, saying that farewells were always painful and that it was my desire to leave no unpleasant memory of my short visit.

"On New Year's day I received, at Paris, a box. It contained nothing but double jasmines. On the anniversary of my saint's day I received another. Contents the same. At the expiration of a year to the very day after my arrival at the chateau, more jasmines. I could no longer doubt from whence they came. The duchess cultivated them at great expense and sent them to me at all seasons.

"After that I received nothing further except a notice of the death of the duchess, and, a short time after, the pearls that you have seen, her earrings, which she bequeathed to me in her will as a memento of the 'day we met'—that was the way the clause ended, 'in memory of the day we met.'

"Now you know my conquest."

"And you believe," I asked my friend with great curiosity, "that the duchess fell ill of grief at not seeing you?"

"The duchess was sixty-five years old," said Zaldua in answer.

THE WHITNEY BUILDING

Among the new buildings nearing completion in the heart of the down down retail district is the eight-story Class A Whitney Building on Geary street, adjoining the City of Paris. The fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh floors are arranged for offices, forty on each floor, and equipped with very modern and sanitary convenience. The remaining floors, the second, third and eighth are to be finished in lofts, and the ground floor is subdivided into stores. Already the stores on the street frontage, the second floor loft and a large number of the offices have been leased, amongst the tenants being numbered: The Kishen Co., one of the most complete Japanese stores on the Pacific Coast; Mary E. Murphy of the Wade Corset Co.; P. Centemeri & Co.; Max Charles & Co., and Altman's, Inc., of New York and Paris. Like all the new buildings, the Whitney surpasses its predecessor, the Star King Building, which formerly occupied the site, but which is favorably remembered as one of the best managed in old San Francisco.

WOBBERS MOVE DOWN TOWN

Wobbers, the stationery firm that settled on Van Ness avenue shortly after the fire have now opened a large store in the Phelan Building on Market street. This is one of the youngest concerns of its kind in town and growing rapidly, which fact is shown by their new place. Engraving, visiting and social cards has always been a feature of their business, and high grade stationery and such things that appeal to the women folks, which they find some difficulty in obtaining everywhere. They do not confine themselves purely to social stationery but also carry a full and complete line of office requirements, ledgers, etc., from which the most discriminating business man can be suited. They have also added a complete line of artists materials and architects supplies, besides a book department where the latest literary works can be found. A cordial invitation from Wobbers is extended to the public to visit and inspect their new store.

—toward Art as a whole—is one of passionate appreciation.

In music he is an amateur in the best sense of the word with a taste that is at once wide and interesting. As he enjoys Cesar Frank, Charpentier, and Puccini, so he enjoys Bach, Beethoven, and Mozart. Untrained as a singer he yet interprets, when in vein, such songs as "La Guillotine" of Cremieux with a dramatic intensity that no one can hear unmoved. In the same way he throws into his recitals of such powerful poems as Richepin's "Le Chemineau," Bruyant's "Soirs de Paris," or passages from "Le Revenant" of Jehan Rictus an extraordinary dramatic passion.

In literature the art of writing is with Martinez paramount to every other consideration, and we find him turning from Nietzsche, Verlaine, Maupassant, Tourgeniev, and George Moore to the stories of Stephenson which he delights to tell to children, translating them fluently and artfully into his own words.

But Martinez is to be thought of and reckoned with not only as a poet by sympathy and taste, but as a poet of performance. Although it is not generally known, he is the author of a considerable number of short poems (most of them in French vers libres) of a peculiarly striking quality in point of fancy and feeling. A remarkable fact in connection with these poems is that fifty or more of them are on the single theme of night. None of them has been published although Professor Dupuey of the University of California has urged Martinez to have them brought out in Paris. Two characteristic examples will help to bear out the statement that Martinez is a painter with something to say.

tioning Burton Holmes' "Travalogues." These lectures are a feature of the intellectual amusement life of Boston, Philadelphia and New York, and come as regularly as the opera, but it is nearly five years since a course has been given in this city. However, we are to make up for the lost time, for Manager Will Greenbaum announces a series of three courses commencing on Thursday night, April 29th, at Christian Science Hall, and so arranged that holders of season tickets will have to attend only twice a week in order to cover the entire course, which will embrace five subjects, Berlin, Paris, London, Vienna and Fez, the capital of Morocco. The talks will be illustrated, as usual, with beautifully colored views and motion pictures all taken by Mr. Holmes and his assistants. The talking part will be assumed this season by Wright Kramer, the well known actor, who has been Mr. Holmes' companion in jaunts to foreign lands for many years. To attend a "Travalogue" is the best substitute for the trip itself, and it is remarkable that a large part of every audience is made up of those who have already visited the scenes, while another considerable following is recruited from persons who were born abroad and enjoy taking their families to see the views of their native lands. For the first time, a series will be given in Oakland at Ye Liberty Theatre on three consecutive Friday afternoons, commencing April 30th. The subjects will be Berlin, Paris and Fez.

Vaudeville at the Orpheum

A program of rare charm, novelty and variety will be given for the week beginning this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum. Mlle. Zelie de Lussan, the celebrated prima donna who has entirely recovered from her cold, will most positively make her appearance and will be heard in choicest operatic selections and ballads. Adeline Dunlap and Frank McCormack, eastern dramatic artists of considerable renown, will, with the assistance of Violet Flugrath, present a dramatic classic by Richard Duffey, called "The Night of the Wedding," which possesses an intense heart interest. It tells the story of a truckman who is about to be married. The brutal treatment of his child by the woman he is engaged to wed is the hinge on which the play swings and eventually separates the pair after they have started for the church. The father's affection proves stronger than the lover's and the woman is turned out of the house by the man whose child she has ill treated. Bill Gordon and Nick Marx, appropriately styled the Weber and Fields of vaudeville, will convulse the audiences with a skit, termed "You Can't Get None." Mons. and Madame Sandwinas, Herculean acrobats from the Nouveau Circue, Paris, will create a sensation, it is said, for the man is a phenomenal athlete while Madame Sandwinas is physically the most marvelous woman ever seen in vaudeville or circus. Next week will be the last of S. Miller Kent & Co.; Elsie Faye, Miller & Westen; Edward Barnes and of the beautiful Parisian danseuse, Joly Violetta. A new series of Motion Pictures will conclude the performance.

"Caught in the Rain" at Ye Liberty

The announcement for Easter week at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, is "Caught in the Rain," which will be presented for the week commencing next Monday evening. It was only last summer that this comedy was presented on the coast with Willie Collier in the star part, but as the comedian's itinerary did not include a visit to Oakland, the Bishop Players will be the first to give trans-bay theatregoers an opportunity of laughing at the absurdities of "Caught in the Rain." It is in three acts and was written by Collier himself, so we all know the brand of humor it expounds. The critics have agreed that it is the best vehicle Collier has had for many years. The scenes are laid in Denver, Colorado, and the characters are all finely drawn, typically American characters. George Friend will have the Collier role in the Liberty production, and should be effective judging from the success he has achieved in some of that comedian's other plays. All of the Liberty favorites will be found in the cast. "Caught in the Rain" will have the usual run of one week, including the Saturday and Sunday matinees, and is to be followed by "Salomy Jane."

In the Limelight

The sale of seats for the new Orpheum which opens April 19th, will begin at the box office of the O'Farrell Street Theatre next Monday morning at nine o'clock.

During the Otis Skinner engagement at the Van Ness Theatre there will be Wednesday and Saturday matinees.

"If I Were King," the romantic drama in which E. H. Sothern scored so successfully, will follow "Peter Pan" at the Valencia Theatre and will serve to introduce the new leading man, Paul McAllister, to San Francisco audiences.

When the new Orpheum moves down town Herr Rosner's Orchestra will be a more delightful feature than ever. It will be augmented by the addition of several instruments which will include a harp and two French horns.

The American Theatre management has provided a decided novelty for the summer, beginning Sunday afternoon, April 25, when a season of high class minstrelsy and burlesque will be inaugurated. The very best stars obtainable in the burnt cork firmament will be brought from New York, with a constant succession of new faces every two weeks. For the opening week among other notables, Carroll Johnson, "The Beau Brummell of Minstrelsy," and a tremendous San Francisco favorite, has been engaged, as well as Emil Subers, one of the funniest end men and monologuists before the public. John King, the well-known comedian, singer and dancer and the best wench impersonator extant, late a feature of George Cohan's "Honey Boy" Minstrels, will be another of the funmakers and among the vocalists will be Matt Keefe, the San Franciscan who has become a famous tenor, and Will Oakland, the contra-tenor who made such a hit with Lew Dockstader's Minstrels last season. There will be a double octette and megaphone chorus for the first part and in the burlesque which follows there will be twenty-five pretty girls, headed by Belle Gold, well remembered here from her work with McIntyre and Heath in "The Ham Tree," and Ella Smith, a prima donna from Lew Field's company. Bobby Harris, also from Field's company, will be the burlesque comedian.

Auto Notes

R. J. McMullen, the well known banker of Oakland, has purchased a six-cylinder seventy horsepower Thomas. The following additional sales are also reported by the Pioneer Automobile Company: George R. Wilson of Modesto, Chalmers-Detroit, S. M. Phillips of Sacramento, an Oldsmobile touring car, H. C. Anderson and W. M. McGrath each a Chalmers-Detroit and H. Streiff of Lakeport, a Chalmers-Detroit.

Three thousand miles without once having to open the hood while on the road, is another Studebaker record, according to G. E. Tarbell of New York City, who three months ago purchased a Studebaker "40" touring car from the New York branch of the Studebaker concern. "We ran the care more than 2,600 miles before we even had a puncture," says Tarbell in his letter to the Studebaker company. "Another thing we appreciate is the easy riding of the machine and the ease with which the speed of the car may be controlled, the driver being able to drive as slowly as three or even two miles an hour without any inconvenience. Our car has also proven itself remarkably quiet."

Robert Belcher who has just returned from a flying trip to Coalinga and the oil wells with his 4-60 Thomas, reports having made the distance from San Francisco to Fresno, 230 miles, with his car, using but a gallon of gasoline to thirteen miles.

One of the most noticeable features of the 1909 automobile season is the enormous sale of low priced cars, a great many of which have been sold to men prominent in the motor and business world. All over the country capitalists who have heretofore owned only high priced machines have now taken up the low priced cars, especially for business purposes. Among the prominent men who have purchased Chalmers-Detroit cars are Dr. James Ward, Dr. H. Seymour, W. M. Worden, a banker of Merced, Captain E. H. Huffman of the Huffman Estate, Thomas L. Morton, the well known coal dealer, Lee De Forest, inventor of the wireless telegraphy, A. L. Westgaud, Secretary of the Bureau of Tours of the Automobile Club of America, John B. Herishoff, and A. R. Shattuck, President of the Automobile Club of America. That such discriminating men should decide to use a car like the Chalmers-Detroit emphasizes the tendency toward the use of the small low priced cars.

"When we adopted that catchy line—Ten years in the Ascendency—the lead will be greater than ever for this year—we were not mistaken," said Mr. Mathewson, Pacific Coast Manager of the Diamond Rubber Co. "Already the truth of this statement has been shown by the fact, that at the ten principal automobile shows in the United States this season, Diamond tires equipped 28 per cent of the cars shown. This is 44 per cent higher than the next nearest competitor while 15 other makers divided the remainder."

"Almost any kind of going can be negotiated by the Studebaker automobile," is the conclusion that has been reached by Chester N. Weaver and his staff of lieutenants at the local branch of the Studebaker company. "Mud, sand, gravel, stone, water and snow have failed to balk the sturdy car when out for endurance records," says Weaver. "Recently these facts have been brought home more forcibly than ever before. It is only necessary to mention the remarkable run one of our "B" cars made to the Muir Woods a few days ago and the trip was completed last week to Fresno over roads which had never before been in a worse condition. That's Studebaker stamina to ponder over."

"Automobilists who are contemplating making the trip this summer from Sacramento to Lake Tahoe, will be interested to know that the prospects for good touring in our section are exceptionally good," said S. M. Phillips when questioned regarding the condition of the country for traveling. Mr. Phillips is an enthusiastic motorist, being representative of the Thomas, Oldsmobile and Chalmers-Detroit in Sacramento. Continuing he said, "The government roads from Placerville to Lake Tahoe are being rapidly put in good condition. The County of Sacramento recently voted $800,000 in bonds for roads and this in conjunction with the bonds recently voted by San Joaquin County to the amount of one and a quarter million, will put the roads in good condition all the way from Stockton to the Lakes. Between Galt, Franklin and Sacramento the roads are now in course of construction but should be completed within a period of sixty days. From Sacramento through to Folsom, excepting only a stretch of about a mile and a half near Mills Station, there is an excellent boulevard. This stretch is under construction and will be completed this month, and we feel that we shall have good reason to be proud of our roads."

The Howard Automobile Company unloaded this week two more carloads of the '09 Buick "White Streaks"—also a shipment of the new 40 horsepower Buick touring cars. Immediate deliveries of the "White Streaks" were made to the following customers: Standard Oil Company, City; Marion Investment & Realty Co., City; G. A. Newhall, City; Bonnard & Knauss, Red Bluff; W. F. Hunt, San Jose; Mr. Leppo, Santa Rosa; F. & A. Fuller, Biggs; W. M. Hale, Redding; and the Santa Rosa Garage of Santa Rosa.

A Story of Heredity

In "The Whips of Time" Arabella Kenealey has made use of that much discussed topic, heredity vs. environment, or, as the stockmen phrase it, breed vs. pasture; or, again, nature vs. nurture, as the broad-minded general reader best likes to express the problem. The prologue introduces two young doctors seated over their after-dinner coffee. One, Dr. Lowood, is a psychologist; his companion, Hummerstone, is a physiologist, a frank materialist. In the course of their conversation Hummerstone confides to his colleague the plan of what he terms an interesting experiment that he is about to engage upon. The scene of the story is English. A notorious criminal trial had just been completed. A trained nurse had been convicted of the wilful poisoning of thirteen persons, men, women and children, with apparently no provocation. As she was about to become a mother she could not be executed under the English law, and an emergency having arisen, it became expedient to care for her at the nearest retreat, which happened to be an aristocratic nursing home. Dr. Hummerstone, temporarily connected with the home, confided to Dr. Lowood his intention of substituting the child of the murderess for that of a well-born and titled lady whose crisis was expected to occur on the same day. He proposed to himself to watch the development of Sarah Munnings' child, lifted out of the slums to a home of wealth and refinement, and prove conclusively to his own satisfaction that parentage was an accident and early environment all. The other child, deprived of its birthright was, in his eyes, a negligible quantity. The mother, satisfied with the infant she believed to be hers, would not be defrauded, or, at any rate, would be none the wiser. Dr. Hummerstone argued that "on the face of it" method was everything and material nothing; Dr. Lowood held that there was much back of "the face" to be taken into consideration. All his efforts to stir Hummerstone proved fruitless, and the confident manner in which the physiologist referred to the "boy" led him to conclude that the mischief had been already begun. Hummerstone, beyond his reference to the sex of the child and the fact that the parents were people of importance in their own county, would say nothing. The story proper begins twenty or more years later. The two doctors had separated. Lowood, a man of simple tastes and ways, having amassed as much of a fortune as he cared to be burdened with, disposed of his practice and determined to retire to some rural village where he could spend his life in peace and comfort. The chance sight of the name of a little town mentioned in a real estate circular reminded him of Hummerstone's almost forgotten experiment, for it was from there that the lady whose child was to have been substituted for that of Sarah Munnings, had come. Curious to see for himself what had been the outcome of the dastardly fraud, he rented a cottage and removed himself and his goods thence. Inquiry as to who were "the" people of the locality led to the information that there were two households each equally prominent. They were closely related, and the two young men who represented them, though diametrically different, were cousins, and within a month of the same age. Moreover, both were born in a nursing home in London, and, without other data, it now devolved upon Dr. Lowood to decide for himself which of the two was hatched from the cuckoo's egg. Robert Legh was the typical young English gentleman, blonde, pink, and popular. Mark Hestroyde was less of a favorite. His complexion was dark, and there was something about him which suggested foreign mixture, perhaps an Oriental strain. He was repressed and self restrained, not given to overmuch speech, and under other conditions, might have developed into a scholar. Chiefly because Hestroyde was "different," Dr. Lowood decided that he must be Munnings, and set himself to watch for the inevitable stigmata of the criminal breed. Of course he found abundant evidence to justify his conclusion, though at the same time Mark was a likable fellow enough. However, it was not impossible that after all, Legh was the wrong man. Meanwhile the other child, Legh? or Hestroyde? had dropped out. If Dr. Lowood had not entered upon the scene with his mind biassed by the very slight, but, as he assumed, reliable hint dropped by Hummerstone, he might have been free to draw conclusions from developments going on under his eye in quite a different and utterly unexpected quarter, and if the reader is clever and attentive, the denouement, as far as the identity of the Munnings offspring is concerned, may become plain at about the middle of the volume. This is no story of wrongs easily righted at a word, as in "Pinafore," but a grim and horrible tragedy in which Hummerstone's experiment develops into a boomerang for him. There seems to be needed a sequel, or rather, a companion volume which would account in some way for the character of Hummerstone's son, who, according to the parental theory, should have been trained into scientific achievement, whereas he was a miserable failure, who resembled his father in nothing save his cool indifference. No novel is complete without a love interest and "The Whips of Time" is rich in that particular, for besides the badly tangled skeins of Mark Hestroyde, Robert Legh, Joan Kesteven and Cyril Hummerstone, there is that other unconventional household maintained by the Duke of Saxby, and the singular position occupied by Alma Wenlith therein. Those two witch-like sisters, the "Epithets," must have been drawn from life, but these, however interesting, are pale stars beside the larger problem of the effect of environment on the unknown child of the arch-field, Sarah Munnings. It would be unfair both to the readers and to the author to give any hint of denouement, which is rational and logical, for, after all, there is more than empty sound to the old saying, "Blood will tell." ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS Subscriber—(1) Yes, we have an Attorney-General. His name is Webb. (2) It is within his power to interfere in such matters as you mention. He probably thinks that nobody is conscious of his apathy.

Taxpayer—It is costing us much more to run the city government now than it did under the Consolidation Act. It is probably because our honest servants are spending your money like drunken sailors.

Voter—No, the direct primary law is not satisfactory. It doesn't please even those who were in favor of it. Both sides will be prepared to kick if it doesn't go right.

Observer—You are quite right. We now have an independent grand jury. Nobody is being intimidated nowadays by threats of indictment, but, as you may have observed, there is a "favorite" police judge before whom warrants are sworn out.

Hayseed—The article was probably written by Judge Lawlor himself. He has free access to the columns of the Bulletin. What he said in his address to the Newman Club was of consequence only to himself. Did you ever hear of anybody rushing into print to set somebody else right? Of course you never did. Hence I conclude that it was Judge Lawlor setting himself right. The conviction is strengthened by the language. The judge loves to use big words. He thinks they bespeak dignity.

CONCENTRATION

The Servant—Professor! There's a thief in the dining-room!

The Astronomer (deep in a calculation)—Tell him I'm too busy to see him!

FIERCE ANIMALS

"What are the most blood-thirsty animals?" a man asked a tamer of wild animals. "Tigers?"

"No, sir."

"Jaguars?"

"Not they."

"Well, sir!"

"Fleas, sir!"

A MODERN HOUSEWIFE

"Why do you look at that 'Still Life' so eagerly and sadly?"

"Oh, those are my favorite delicacies, represented in it. As my wife can't cook them she painted them for me as a birthday present!"

UNCONSCIOUS RUDENESS

"After a good dinner I like to smoke a cigar."

"Can I offer you one?"

"Oh, no, thank you, I would rather not smoke today."

ALL EXCELLENT REASONS

"Come in and have a drink with me."

"Can't, I tell you. In the first place, I'm the president of the Anti-alcoholic League; then, I haven't time to take a single drink today; and finally, I had my third glass just a quarter of an hour ago!"

The Era of Purity

The conquest of evil is the problem of the hour, and the army of righteousness is marching to the solution thereof under the milk white banner of Prohibition. We must all bow to the smiting presence of the new light that has dawned on the freest people on earth. It has come to pass that we are free only to be good, and that under the compelling winds of statute and penalty the recalcitrant individual conscience is drifting to a complete moral deliverance. The innumerable joys of living are rapidly decreasing; the country is going dry, the sport of kings has been banished, the Salome dance has been rendered innocuous by purification, and the drama has been ordered to clothe itself with religion. Public sentiment demands not merely the subjugation but the extirpation of sensual affections. We are no longer misled by the Christian philosophy which, though it insists on moral perfection, insists also on the corruption of human nature. The philosophy of the Stoics having become fashionable, if not in practice at least in preaching, we are about to demonstrate to the world the fallacy of the ancient axiom that the most governed people are the worst governed and prove that by virtue of legislative enactment an enlightened people can realize the loftiest ideal that was ever conceived. It will be of no consequence if while we are realizing this ideal the only contented ones amongst us are bromidic ladies and gentlemen in whom there is a congenital indisposition to vice in any form.

The Lottery Business

For the present the good people of this city who are engaged in improving its moral tone are intent upon extirpating the gambling evil. There are some men so devoted to gambling that the mere sight of a game of chance exercises an irresistible influence over them, until, like the giddy gazer over a precipice their whole longing is to indulge the fatal weakness. These men must be saved. On the principle which recognizes that the manufacture of liquor must be prohibited because some men get drunk, gambling games ought to be abolished because some men lose more money than they can afford to lose. Furthermore all forms of gambling are demoralizing. This being the case we suppose that the three lottery companies which are now doing a thriving business in this city by kind permission will be put out of business. The moralists of the daily press have nothing to say on this subject because there are more important things to engage their attention. To intimate that the moral dailies sympathize with the lottery companies because they are paid very liberally for publishing the so-called winning numbers, would be to impugn motives that should be above suspicion. We are not versed in the motives of all our contemporaries, but we hope that no public official is restrained from enforcing the law against lotteries through fear of incurring the wrath of the moral press by reducing its income. Aside from the fact that the lottery business is an illegal gambling business, it has become a greater fraud than ever on the public since the suppression of the big lotteries whose drawings governed the local gamblers. Nobody knows anything about the drawings nowadays, but it is known that while one hundred thousand numbers are presumed to be drawn not more than forty thousand are sold by any of the companies.

The Morse and Bartnett Cases

There was a time when there could be nothing more grateful to our vanity than to find that our views on any subject, especially on any ethical question, coincided with the sentiments of two such noble and erudite exemplars of the good and the true as Dr. Lyman Abbott and Hamilton W. Mabie, editors of the Outlook. We must confess, however, that this pleasing concurrence was very rare. Filled with the enthusiasm of humanity in the abstract, despite their unbounded charity and forbearance they have no enthusiasm for man in the concrete, and consequently it has been difficult for us to attain the commanding standpoint from which serenely they survey the high and deep places of the human spirit and the larger and profounder questions of political destiny. One of the rare instances of the oneness of ourselves with the distinguished moral philosophers of the Outlook occurred when they protested against the proposition to pardon Charles W. Morse, the banker now imprisoned in the Tombs of New York City. In the familiar and edifying platitudes with which they regaled their readers we heartily concurred. For example: "Before the law there are no differences of condition"; a reflection this that none can refute. Furthermore: "Mr. Morse's friends should not forget the community whose trust he betrayed," nor "the moral disaster of such a fall as his"; nor should they forget "the greater responsibility of a man so placed." These sentiments, when first we read them, filled us with enthusiasm. They intensified our respect for the learned and pious philosophers who have done so much toward effecting the canonization of the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt. But since pondering these sentiments the case of Mr. W. J. Bartnett has been called to our attention by the reigning civic patriots of San Francisco, and with out feeble intellectuals in a haze it occurred to us that we should fortify ourselves against a reverence which might easily become a superstition. Perhaps Dr. Abbott and Mr. Mabie have been deluding us with golden fallacies. In the nature of a counterblast to their eloquence is the wisdom which breathes in the sentiments of some of our local moralists for whom men and motives are always transparent. Mr. Bartnett, we learn, under conviction of felony in connection with the infamous looting and wrecking of the Safe Deposit Bank, is on the way East with the consent of our irreproachable District Attorney, and inferentially with the consent of the holy and inexorable sanhedrim which at present governs this municipality by proxy. Mr. Bartnett, we are told, is to be permitted to invoke the aid of friends with a view to the rehabilitation of the wrecked bank, with the understanding that success is the price of freedom. Here is a case then which proves that Messrs. Abbott and Mabie are not infallible; for we see that before the law there is a difference of condition; we see that what in the case of a common criminal would be regarded as something in the nature of "compounding a felony," in the case of a banker may receive the sanction of our highest juridical officers. Furthermore we see that it is not incumbent on Mr. Phelan, Mr. Spreckels and the other influential friends of Mr. Bartnett to remember "the community whose trust he betrayed"; that it is their privilege to forget "the moral disaster of such a fall as his"; even to forget "the greater responsibility of a man so placed." The amiable and charitable view that is taken of the Bartnett case, we find, commends itself to us more than does the harsh and stringent view of the Morse case taken by Dr. Abbott and Mr. Mabie. We hope that Mr. Bartnett achieves the price of liberty, and we believe that our hope is shared by Professor Boke, the sternest of moralists, who is at present ostensibly teaching law in the university which improved Mr. Bartnett's morals. If Professor Boke entertained the sentiments that have been expressed by the Outlook's editors; if, for example, he believed that when it becomes known "that influential position counts against a man and not for him there will be very few cases of trusted men becoming defaulters and swindlers"; if, we repeat, a puerile sentiment of this nature appealed to the sincere and intellectually honest Professor Boke, he would promptly call a meeting of the ladies and gentlemen of the League of Justice and incite them to the adoption of resolutions of protest against the treatment that has been so generously accorded Walter J. Bartnett. Between editing the Liberator and drumming up money for a building to be erected at Berkeley to the greater glory of himself and the Hon. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, Professor Boke is kept pretty busy earning the salary which the State pays for his services, but he can always find time to avert moral disaster in this community. With Professor Boke the moral issue is paramount, and in his philosophy there is nothing so wholesome as example. That he sees nothing unwholesome in the Bartnett case is prima facie evidence of its being free from sinister suggestion. It is now up to Abbott and Mabie to amend their philosophy.

Crowned Heads Nod to a Passing "Sovereign"

Our Exalted One is well on his way to the happy hunting grounds of Africa. He is in a hurry and has had little time to receive the homage of kings en route; in Italy only the populace, the proletariat and the lazzaroni were on the quay to greet him with hail and farewell as his ship passed in the night—the reigning potentate being himself busy with pressing affairs of State was represented by a few Dukes and Marquises who could be spared from the palace entourage. At Port Said the nominal Khedive of all the Egyptians sent his proxy of "cousinly" greeting by the hands of the Pasha that carries the bowstring to disobedient and recalcitrant satraps in distant provinces. Now the Exalted One is somewhere East of Suez where there ain't no ten commandments; nor diademed emperors to do him reverence. Soon he will be in Mombasa, a seaport in British East Africa (latitude 4 degrees 4 minutes South; longitude 39 degrees 43 minutes East); headquarters of the British East Africa Company; formerly a Portuguese dependency, later a possession of Zanzibar when the Zanzibarbarians were a king-ruled folk; now merely the terminal point of a railroad to the happy hunting grounds of East Africa and a naval coaling station for British cruisers coasting from Cape Town to Calcutta and the Asiatic stations. What will happen to our distinguished exile after he leaves Mombasa only the oracles can predict and these are silent. He will traverse the well-beaten path that was blazed by Speke and Bruce and Baker and Gobat and Beke and Parkyns and Stern and Cameron and Grant and Livingston and Stanley and scores of engineers, bridge-builders and hunters that have not aspired to be called "mighty." No doubt he will receive the homage and possibly the adoration of numerous chiefs of native tribes, but the only real king wearing a real crown, through whose dominions the Great American will pass on his triumphal progress, is Menelek, Emperor of the Abyssinians who rules over the kingdoms of Tigre and Lasta and Amhara and Gojam and Shoa and many outlying territories and dependencies; possibly Menelek will send a royal deputation to welcome the Wandering Roosevelt at Ankobar or to bid him Godspeed with a royal gift of ivory and lion hides, at Kassala. Thenceforward there will be nothing to disturb the monotony of the pilgrimage of this American hero until he boards the Nile steamboat at Batu El Majar or at Assuan. But throughout the journey the eyes of all the world including the eyes of all the emperors, kings, rulers and potentates will be upon their fellow monarch, uncrowned, or discrowned, though he may be. There will be no lack of publicity, notwithstanding the imperial orders to the contrary issued from the regal, or semi-regal, presence. Reporters of the daily press will be within hailing distance at all hours of the day and night to receive such information as may be graciously vouchsafed by the Exalted One for transmission to an eagerly expectant and anxiously waiting world on the outside. Otherwise it might be constantly feared by the peoples of all the kingdoms of the earth that the Mighty Hunter had been eaten by an irreverent lion or swallowed by a sacrilegious crocodile. Imagine, if you dare to think of it, how the nations would worry if they were left in suspense for a week regarding the whereabouts, the condition of health, and the state of mind of the Eminent Explorer while traversing the frequently surveyed Cape to Cairo railroad route. No doubt Roosevelt himself realizes the anxiety of Europe, Asia and especially America concerning his welfare while he is abroad; and although he has given strict orders that he shall not be disturbed in his expedition by newspaper reporters and camera men, still, considering the importance of himself and the necessity of his continued existence to the world at large, he will unquestionably keep us informed regarding his movements while jungling and junketing in what was once Darkest Africa.

Why Roosevelt is "Great"

so obvious that an answer was superfluous. If anyone should ask upon what meat our replica of Rome's most prominent citizen has fed that he hath grown so great, it would be necessary to answer; for the fatness of Roosevelt is not so easily accounted for as was that of the conqueror of Gaul. It is true that Theodore Roosevelt has been the President of the greatest republic of modern times; but there have been Presidents before Roosevelt, as there were heroes before Agamemnon, and there will be Presidents after him, many of who will achieve no more than a dim memory in the minds of posterity, none of whom, it is believed, will create as loud a noise in contemporary affairs as has emanated from the Big Stickster of America. This noise will die away in a few years, and the memory of Roosevelt will probably dissolve to a blurred and indistinct reflection on the moving picture of history; but in the meantime it is pertinent that we should inquire why this Roosevelt is so great that crowned heads and hereditary monarchs bow to him familiarly and ostentatiously as he passes by; why the mobs of Italy and the fellahin of Egypt flock to gaze upon him; why the semi-savages of Africa assemble their tribes to do obeisance as his caravan moves along the high roads of Uganda and Kardofan and Sudan; why even his fellow citizens of the American republic are so infatuated with him that they organize themselves into "leagues" and couple his name with a hyphen to that of the immortal Lincoln. Future historians will not trouble themselves to learn why Theodore Roosevelt was deemed great by his contemporaries, because the future historian will be occupied with more important research, and because the contemporary greatness of Roosevelt will not reach beyond the memory of men now living—because the name of Roosevelt will be inevitably absorbed, overwhelmed, overshadowed, lost in the crowd of statesmen, warriors, heroes that will throng upon the stage of the world as the years roll into centuries and the centuries accumulate into millenniums. Already, as we analyze the career of Roosevelt we begin to discover that he is not really great; that he is merely a loud noise and a living, breathing disturbance of the peace. We now know that he is not a statesman nor scarcely a wise politician. We realize that Roosevelt was great only as greatness is conferred by the opportunity of a great office. Any mountebank can simulate greatness on a throne or in the chair of a temporary President of a democracy. Some men are born great; Roosevelt was born of rich but respectable parents; some men achieve greatness; Roosevelt climbed to eminence on the ladder of New York politics, beginning at the bottom where he was content to serve the purposes of his political faction in the humble capacity of a Commissioner of the Municipal Police until the leaders of the faction saw fit to promote him to the Governorship of the State; and finally, some men have greatness thrust upon them—which was the good fortune of Theodore Roosevelt. Whatever greatness is now ascribed to him by adulatory sycophants and fawning courtiers was the direct result of persistent and world-wide advertising. The greatness of Roosevelt is only to be measured by the magnitude of Roosevelt's vanity. He has had every opportunity to keep his name in the newspapers and before the public. But the newspapers are not history; they are only the data from which the historian may derive something purporting to be facts which require in every instance to be corroborated and confirmed by other facts. Eliminate the newspapers from that which we call Roosevelt and what is left? Only Roosevelt—an ordinary personage whose acts are merely spectacular, whose "policies" are for the greater part absolute buncombe, whose opinions are fustian, whose statecraft is brummagem, whose utterances are as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. Therefore when we ask, "Upon what meat hath this our Roosevelt fed that he hath grown so great?" we answer, "Upon no meat, forsooth; and he is not really great; he is only an inflation of the puffery of the press and the hot air of the mob; he is a bubble blown from the soap suds of democracy—and it is the destiny of bubbles to burst sooner or later."

Women and the Tariff

The women are taking a hand in tariff reform and apparently taking it seriously. We hear from all sections of the country of leagues pledged to forego gloves and other fripperies on which the duty has been raised, and of monster petitions to be forwarded to Congress. The merchants are said to have agreed to fall into line and to arrange for keeping the petitions in their emporiums, where the shoppers may be induced to affix their signatures. Millionairesses whose daily pin money amounts to more than the monthly salary of the most favored "wage slaves" are importuning the saleswomen, office assistants and factory hands to join in the movement which will, they confidently hope, result in removing the obnoxious tariff from imported silk hosiery and underwear, French hats and gowns, jewelry, lace and high priced gloves. The movement is to be made a part of the suffragette demonstration, and tyrant man is expected to cower in fear and promise to "be good." If the women of the working world have the common sense, which it would be only fair to credit them with, they will do nothing so foolish as to concern themselves with the economies of their wealthy sisters. Instead they will give their support and assistance to those more nearly of their own class, the stocking weavers and glove makers of America, whose productions are quite good enough for people in moderate circumstances. The girl earning from four and a half to six dollars a week is not likely to be affected by the price of French silk hosiery at ten dollars the pair; nor need she lose any sleep over the problem of how the Mackays, the Goulds and Vanderbilts are to meet the increase of perhaps twenty-five cents in the cost of their elbow length gloves. And so it is down the whole line of "iniquitous exactions." The women who can afford the luxuries are very well able to pay the price of their indulgence. There is not the remotest danger that they will deprive themselves of what ministers to the gratification of their vanity, though it is more than probable that some of them will use the opportunity to reduce the wages of their servants or stand off their tradesmen.

Long After

I see your white arms gliding
  In music o'er the keys,
Long drooping lashes hiding
  A blue like summer seas;
The sweet lips wide asunder,
  That tremble as you sing,
I could not choose but wonder,
  You seemed so fair a thing.

For all these long years after
  The dream has never died;
I still can hear your laughter,
  Still see you at my side;
One lily hiding under
  The waves of golden hair;
I could not choose but wonder,
  You were so strangely fair.

I keep the flower you braided
  Among those waves of gold;
The leaves are sere and faded,
  And, like our love, grown old.
Our lives have lain asunder,
  The years are long, and yet,
I could not choose but wonder,
  I cannot quite forget.

Perspective Impressions

The plain people are becoming bewildered by the number of reforms which they are told they demand.

The only real danger that threatens this country at present is the danger of being reformed out of existence.

President Taft has decided that he will pay his own railroad expenses. Another Roosevelt policy gone a-glimmering.

Another novelist has just completed what he regards as his most important work. Which reminds us that it is a wise author that knows when he is at his best. Even Milton was partial to the least of his epics.

The tragic error of Oscar Wilde's life was that he ignored the fact that by causing the arrest of a man for libel the accused is given the opportunity of proving not only that he told the truth but that he might have told much more. And yet notwithstanding the warning of Wilde's experience there still are fools that rush in where angels fear to tread.

Andrew Lang advises young folks to read for pleasure and stop when they are bored. Good advice, but do the young folks need it?

When the cowboys of Oklahoma caught Crazy Snake's son they hung him to the limb of a tree to extort a revelation of his father's whereabouts. Thus the work of civilizing the wards of the nation goes merrily on.

In its enthusiasm for a municipal street railroad the Examiner neglects to advance the most cogent argument that can be employed in behalf of its hobby. In other words it fails to point with pride to the masterly sagacity and efficiency which are displayed in all the departments of our municipal government.

That eminent lexicographer Ambrose Bierce defines Garter as, "An elastic band designed to prevent women from emerging from their stockings and devastating the world." If Uncle Joe and the other Solons at Washington do not stop monkeying with "hosiery," this definition will acquire added value as a true prophecy.

Wild Animals You Have Never Met

You Will See Them Roaming as if at Large at the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition,—Some of the Other Unique Features.

The Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition promises to be "different," and different in so many ways that the usual comment of tourists, that having seen one mammoth fair they have seen all, will not apply in this case. The wild game preserve in itself will be a great novelty, distinct as far as possible from a circus side show. The animals will be really wild, and will be exhibited in natural surroundings, though, of course, not in the untrammeled condition in which nature permits them to roam. Ten acres on the shores of Lake Washington have been set apart, and nothing has been done in the way of clearing save what has been absolutely necessary. Here are gathered specimens of every wild animal found in the west, northwest and far north, and every effort has been made to secure a complete representation. The fauna of the Pacific Coast is extensive and many of the species are peculiar to this section. Government representatives have been employed in Alaska for the past two years for the purpose of adding to this exhibit, and they have succeeded in effecting the capture of examples of nearly every variety of wild life indigenous to the territory: Live deer, elk, moose, bear, cougar, panther, timber wolf, polar bear, and the smaller creatures whose haunts are far from trodden paths.

The most remarkable collection of brilliantly colored sea fishes in existence will be on view likewise. The territorial aquarium of Hawaii, in Honolulu, has long been celebrated for the variety and numbers represented in its collection, but it is chiefly in the multiplicity of colors and gorgeous tints that the fishes of the "Paradise of the Pacific" are remarkable. Professor David Starr Jordan, one of the world's highest authorities on the subject, says "No aquarium can boast of a collection of fishes more unique in form and coloring, though some have a greater number." This aquarium will be transported to the exposition at Seattle. The display has been greatly increased in extent and value since Professor Jordan gave his opinion. The work of the United States Fish Commission in Hawaiian waters has resulted in a number of wonderful discoveries in sea life, and the exhibit, now complete and ready for transportation, is the finest and most comprehensive collection of marine life ever assembled.

There will be electricity to burn, both figuratively and literally, at the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition, when it opens at Seattle on June 1, and not only will it be used lavishly for decorative and illuminative effects and for power in connection with other exhibits, but the electrical display itself will be an exposition. Snoqualmie Falls, "the Niagara of the Northwest," provides all that the city has present use for, and, with a sufficient equipment of "harness," is believed to be capable of supplying every State in the northwest. Of the power brought down from Snoqualmie, ten thousand K. W. will be delivered at the substation at the fair grounds. Of this the exposition will take twenty-five hundred K. W. The United States Government Concessions, the amusement way, the "Pay Streak," and other large demands will be supplied from the remainder. The substation will also take care of the overload from the street railway terminals. The ten thousand K. W. will be delivered at the substation at a voltage of thirteen thousand two hundred. There it will be transformed to a two thousand three hundred voltage, and sent around the grounds. In the buildings it will be changed to 117-234 on a three-wire system. Each building is equipped with a fire proof transformer room, under the rules of the fire underwriters. A two-phase sixty-cycle light and power system has been put in, with all wiring underground. No pole is shown anywhere on the grounds, though a belt pole line encircles the entire exposition ground. Altogether there will be a quarter of a million lamps used, of four, eight, sixteen, twenty and thirty-two candle power, carbon filament, as well as various larger sizes of tungstens. In the Fine Arts Building there has been arranged a special installation declared by engineers the finest for the purpose anywhere west of the Mississippi.

The central feature of the exposition is a cascade down which forty thousand gallons of water will plunge over a system of dams every minute. At the lip of each dam heavy hoods protect powerful lights behind glass of the prime colors which shade from lighter tones in the center to darker at the outside. At the preliminary trial of the arrangement a magnificent effect was produced.

Elaborate experiments in wireless telegraphy and telephony will be conducted during the exposition, and there will be a remarkable demonstration of the wireless projection of power. Every known telegraphic and telephonic device will be exhibited, and in the Transpor-

Oh, Vanity! Thy Name is Woman!

Why the Eternal Feminine is Hopelessly Obsessed by Absurd Fashion, and Why the Better Half Refuses to Submit to the Superior Critical Judgment of the Other Half in Matters of Feminine Adornment.

By Democritus

Moral satirists are making a great to do over the irreverent manner in which the Christian churches celebrated the festival called "Easter." The churches are not blamed for what the satirists insist was "a desecration of a solemn and holy rite," but they are sharply criticised for permitting and even encouraging the "desecration." It is related that thousands of women who seldom attend church and are not members of the swell churches, crowded to the fashionable houses of worship and literally fought their way to the pews, eager to display their own finery and to gaze upon the finery of their neighbors. From one church in New York sixteen women were carried out swooning, overcome by the perfume of flowers and suffocated in the crush of gorgeously gowned femininity. In this city one of the cathedrals was packed with people that did not belong there and after the pews were unlocked these interlopers wrangled and squabbled for possession of the seats from which the best view of the massed millinery could be had. Everything was in the form and fashion of Vanity Fair and even the vestments of the officiating clergy were brocaded with gold lace and bullion upon satin of price and cloth of tissue.

But the satirists are off on the wrong foot. Easter is not, primarily, a Christian festival. It is an adaptation, as everybody now knows, from the pagan Scandinavian mystery commemorating the annual recurrence of Spring. The heathen idea was so apt to the Christian idea of the resurrection, that it was incorporated in the ritual of the early church first as a politic concession to prejudices of the Teutonic tribes in process of conversion to Christianity, and in course of time as a canonical ceremonial.

In the olden time there was no objection on the part of the Christian fathers to participation of heathen hordes in the celebration of the pagan festival of Easter even when the celebration was conducted by the priests of the Christian church; and there should be no objection now to similar participation in the modern rite by the heathen hordes of up-to-date Christendom.

Easter is a woman's festival. The period called "Lent" has been occupied in the preparation of fine raiment and the selection of millinery to out-glory the peacock plumes of the Queen of Sheba when she came to call on Solomon in all his splendor. Originally Lent was a season of humilation and fasting and penance and prayer and purging from the sins of the flesh; but latterly it has been a season of robing and disrobing; cutting and basting and fitting; trying on and casting off; primping and preening and pluming; posing and posturing and powdering—it has been the period when the pier glass was the medium of pious reflection and the dressmaker the high priestess of the shrine of feminine vanity.

It was but meet that all this vanity should bloom in the Spring, like the lilies of the valley, tra la—the lilies of the field that toil not neither do they spin, but are arrayed in glory surpassing the glory of Israel's wisest king. And since the church has appointed a time for celebrating the lily season and the rejuvenation of nature after her Winter sleep, what time is more appropriate for the annual efflorescence of feminine vanity?

It is not against the church or against religion that the moral satirists should level their shafts. And the satirists might as well save their shafts for follies more vulnerable than those which make up the sum of woman's vanity. Woman in her pride, armored with her vanity, is impervious to the keenest ridicule and impregnable to the bitterest sarcasm. Envy alone has power to disturb feminine equanimity. It is the other woman that disturbs the peace of mind of the woman that realizes the inferiority of her millinery or the comparative poverty of her attire. The criticism or protest of mere man is as the whisper of the warm South wind through the lattice of a house of mirth in old Cairo's Red Bazar; as the limbat of Sumatra caressing the supple bamboo in the jungle; as the cry of the curlew aflight across the sands of Dee in the eventide when they call the cattle home—call the cattle home.

When moral satire is directed at woman in her vanity it is scatheless. You may accuse her of all the sins in the calendar—of sacrilege, blasphemy, irreverence, impiety, infidelity, atheism—she will answer with scorn and stare you down for an egregious and fat-witted fool, if your accusation is in denunciation of her Easter vanity. But it is only the moral satirist who attempts to correct the follies of woman's vanity. All other men are wise in a discretion born of bitter experience. The men who are married have been taught better sense by their plumed and bejeweled mates; the unmarried are blind. There is no remedy for woman's vanity. Even in Paradise she was vain of her fig-leaf; and in Heaven she will be vain of her ascension robe. There is only one thing that a woman will not do for the man she loves—she will not discard a fashionable hat for him, nor will she modify a fashionable gown to suit the barbarous taste. She will die for love of the man of her choice, and she gladly endures the sharpest agony that human flesh is heir to for him and for the sake of the child that is his; but to please him she will not abate a single ruffle on her skirt nor put on the dress that makes her more beautiful in his eyes, unless, perchance the fashion books have so decreed—and it is odds of a hundred to one that the fashion books are forever at variance with the taste and the desire of the man that is beloved of woman.

The Fan

(Translated from the German of Hermann Sudermann)

In Berlin there are not many private residences. Even the rich live in apartment houses. Each of these is in charge of a concierge who locks the front door punctually every night at ten o'clock. The tenants are supplied with keys which are very large and not easy to carry about. But this story is not about a key. It is about a tenor.

There arrived in Berlin one day a Mrs. Lily Brand, widow of a Westphalian manufacturer, the only praiseworthy act of whose life was his departure therefrom. The widow came to Berlin with the air of an enchanted princess who had been held captive up a factory chimney. She brought with her the habit of blowing gently over her arms as if removing stray specks of coal dust. Yet her arms were snow white, and she was pure to the innermost recesses of her heart. A most charming little woman was the widow, with her big, innocent blue eyes and her luxuriant auburn hair. Smiling wistfully, she sat waiting for—Love.

We all paid our court, but we were none of us good enough for her. We were too shallow, she said; it was only pretensions that were deep, fathomless.

"He must be my fate, as I shall be his," she once said to me with a melancholy upward glance of her eyes, "but he must have the strength to renounce, as I shall have." She sighed deeply. I also sighed. And then we laughed at each other.

It happened about the same time that a famous singer appeared in Berlin to fullfil a short engagement at the Opera.

The world of women received him with open arms; they applauded him and dined him and wined him—a little tremblingly, too, for the aureole of the wildest kind of Don Juan romanticism surrounded his person, and never yet, so it was said, had a woman been able to withstand his violent onslaught. Everyone knows the delightful terror with which the hypersensitive feminine imagination hails the appearance of such a messiah; we all know how infectious the fever is.

After all, is not the tenor the ideal male? He wears the glorious costume of the soldier, crams a hero's life of gallant feats into a few hours every evening, and carols his magnetic high C like—a tenor. Who can wonder at his success with the weaker sex? He delights their eyes, excites their imagination and soothes their senses. The only thing he usually lacks is the feeling for ideal love. Woe to the romantic woman who thinks to find in the man what the singer promises so sweetly.

Mrs. Brand caught the universal intoxication even more violently than did the others; for in her the soft longings of the love-craving woman were united with the fascinating terror of the curious child.

Fairly beside herself with delight, she returned from the Opera, where she had seen him for the first time in all his glory, received with cheers, bombarded with laurel wreaths.

Two days later she obtained an invitation from a friend, a leader of society, which bore in one corner, plus the engraved formula, the penciled words: "He will be there."

She smothered her slender figure in a billowy ocean of lace, and with trembling hands fastened fragrant roses in her tresses. Fair and timid as a water nymph who gazes for the first time on the splendors of the upper world, she entered the ballroom. He had not yet arrived. It was even feared that he might at the last moment decline. Men like him could allow themselves such little irregularities. Breathlessly waiting, she sat there—and with her all the others.

Toward half-past ten a joyful flutter ran through the room. From the hall came the glad news. The door opened. It was he! His tired glance swept negligently over the room, seeking his hostess, whom he scarcely knew. A Byronic lock of hair fell gloomily over his furrowed brow. A faint, exotic scent emanated from his person.

"It is he—he is my fate!" whispered Mrs. Brand, and lowered her sparkling glance to her lap, for she could scarcely bear the dazzling sight of him.

He disappeared into one of the deserted adjacent apartments. It wasn't worth his while to waste time on conversation.

Later it was whispered about the rooms: "He will sing!"

"Oh, dear," whispered Mrs. Brand, "I shall never be able to bear it! I know I shall do something foolish!"

He appeared again on the surface. His gloved hands swept nervously over his temples, at which the gloomy lock fell lower over his eyebrows. Evidently he was imitating Rubinstein.

He began. He had chosen Tosti's wailing aria, "Vorrei morir," the same with which Mierczwinski reaped such rich triumphs later. A world of immeasurable woe streamed out of his mouth. The tones lashed the women's nerves like whips. There lay in them the wild outcry of the foiled seeker of happiness, the last breath of the blissfully dying. The mad grief of Laocoon was written on the singer's brow. His dimmed eye roamed about the room as if seeking to cling to something before it broke. And, behold! It rested on Mrs. Brand's lovely little person!

An electric shiver ran down her back. "Vorrei morir," she repeated dreamily. Her eye had looked upon her savior—now she could die.

At supper-time the hostess came to her, and pressing her hand with the touched emotion of a benefactress, whispered: "Thank me, Lily; you are to sit on his left."

I took her in to supper. It was no pleasure, I can tell you, for that night I was air to her. Her eyes devoured his every gesture. She breathed in the gusts of air his waving sleeves created.

He drew off his gloves and threw them into an empty wineglass. A veritable armor of diamonds blazed on his long, yellow hands. Between his fingers clung little grains of powder, which he rubbed lovingly into the skin.

He was monosyllabic—great men always are.

Once in a while he tossed his hostess a compliment as one throws a bone to a little dog. She gnawed at it blissfully.

Mrs. Brand he deigned to overlook.

He occupied himself all the more eagerly with his plate. The lobster pasties met with his full approval; he helped himself twice to roast lamb; at sight of the trout the first gleam of joy came over his gloomy countenance, and the poulardes won him completely back to life. Between whiles he poured down the old Chambertin in streams.

At length a milder look fell on Mrs. Brand also. "Did my song please you?" he asked, with the air of a man who contemplates solving the riddle of the universe.

"Oh, how can I thank you?" she stammered.

Manson's Costly Word

In view of Mr. Marsdon Manson's relations with the city arising from the projected municipal water system, a decision handed down by our Supreme Court on March 31st is of interest to more than the legal profession. By this decision the Supreme Court reverses the judgment of the trial court in the case of the City Street Improvement Company against the City of Marysville, and as a result, in all probability, the taxpayers of the City of Marysville will lose about $30,000, that being the estimated cost of rectifying the defects in the city's new sewer system which was constructed under the supervision of Mr. Manson. Mr. Manson was the engineer in charge of the work. He had several assistants who were employed by the city at his suggestion, and during the progress of the work partial payments were made on his certificates. When the system was almost completed he so reported orally, and he specified in a certificate just what work had been done and said that he believed the contractor might safely be paid all but $1,000 of the total contract price which was about $32,000. All these facts are recited in the decision of our Supreme Court, together with the additional fact that as the sewers were not constructed in accordance with specifications when a test of the work was made it was found that somebody had blundered. The whole system leaked to the extent of nearly three-fourths of the carrying capacity of the sewers. Upon whom does the blame rest? Far be it from me to suggest. Let us see what the court says: "These certificates necessarily implied that the work so certified was done according to the specifications and to his (Manson's) approval. The final certificate showed all the agreed work to be done, necessarily to the approval and satisfaction of the engineer, and this certificate was reinforced by the oral statement of the engineer to the same effect made to the council." The court held that these certificates settled the matter. It is a principle of law that the time to accept or reject work is when the work is being done. Otherwise the contractor might be lulled into the belief that unsatisfactory work was satisfactory. The engineer in such cases is constituted an arbitrator and his word is final. It has proved unfortunate for the City of Marysville that the word of Mr. Manson was final. Of course Mr. Manson is not entirely to blame. His assistants appointed at his suggestion failed to make proper examinations of the work. Nevertheless responsibility appears to be on his shoulders. Let us hope that Mr. Manson will see to it that none but competent and vigilant assistants are in charge of the work of bringing water from Hetch-Hetchy.

Hubbard Hubbardizing

Elbert Hubbard has been in town. Elbert Hubbard is one of our national freaks. He is the man that made East Aurora famous. East Aurora is a crossroads village in New York and it is called East Aurora to distinguish it from Aurora, Illinois, though why any place should be called "Aurora" has never been satisfactorily explained—and as the original Aurora was the goddess of the dawn, always depicted in art and mythology as rising from the ocean in the East, her rosy fingers dropping gentle dew, or scattering flowers before the chariot of Phoebus or advancing through the air pursuing Night who flees ever westward attended by the Hours sprinkling the earth with dew, it would seem to be somewhat in the nature of a classical or geographical tautology to call even a back-section village "East Aurora." But such things aside: Elbert Hubbard, to whom East Aurora, N. Y., is indebted for widespread advertisement, has been in town. He lectured here on "Hubbardism as a Fine Art"; then he went to San Jose where he lectured on "Why I Am The Only Hubbard Worth While"; and on Tuesday he lectured in Berkeley on "Hubbard—Just Plain Hubbard." He took a day off last Wednesday for a visit to Luther Burbank "the plant wizard" at Santa Rosa, and had a long conference with the vegetable necromancer in relation to the hybridization of the Hubbard squash with the egg plant and the milk weed to produce a fruit from which custard pie can be made instead of homely and plebeian squash pie now extracted from the humble Hubbard. He was informed by the "wizard" that while it had been possible to eliminate the spine from the cactus and to make two Shasta daisies grow where only one grew before, the boon demanded by the smartest citizen of East Aurora, N. Y., was quite impossible. If the namesake of the Hubbard squash had asked that a silk purse be grafted from a sow's ear, or even that a penny whistle be budded on a pig's tail, the request might have been complied with, but to fool old Dame Nature into giving the ingredients of a custard pie to a Hubbard squash was as impracticable as to extract sunbeams from cucumbers, to soften marble for pillows and pin-cushions, to petrify the hoofs of horses to prevent them from foundering or to sow chaff to reap barley, rye and wheat, as Dean Swift tells us was vainly attempted by the empirical philosophers of Laputa. So Hubbard went on his way lecturing about Hubbard.

An Unprofitable Partnership

The ladies of the Fabiola Hospital of Oakland are greatly disturbed because they failed to profit by the business arrangement which they entered into with the owners of a circus. They thought that a circus was the surest money maker of all the shows that traverse the pike. It is a hallowed tradition older than Barnum, as old as the raree shows of St. Bartholomew's that when a circus leaves town it takes with it all the money. The tradition is probably founded in fact—like many other traditions; and there is no substantial proof that the traditional habit of circuses was violated in this instance. In fact the circus with which the Fabiola ladies established a partnership did leave town with all the money in sight—and that is why the ladies are disturbed. They

AURORA, OR THE AWAKENING OF DAWN

It might also be called the awakening of the artistic sense in local theatredom, for this is the painting, which, in the new Orpheum will serve as a drop curtain instead of the ugly advertising sheet that has long been familiar to playgoers. The advertising drop produced a revenue to the theatre of $12,000 a year, but Morris Meyerfeld, President of the Orpheum Company, has pronounced it intolerable. The painting is the work of A. Z. D. Cavallero.

feel like the small boy that carried water to the elephant and was refused admittance to the show. They rooted for the circus from Dan (which is Berkeley) to Beersheba (which is Alameda); they sold tickets for "the greatest aggregation"; they neglected their homes; they planned and plotted and connived; and they were sure at last that the great tent would be filled from sawdust to guy ropes. But alas for the hope deferred that maketh the heart sick—the tent was full, but when the account of receipts was rendered the Fabiola dividend was an entirely negligible quantity. Whatever money was "in the house" stayed there and departed with the circus people when they folded their tent like the Arabs and silently stole away. Hereafter the ladies of Fabiola will devote their energy to something surer than a Spring circus. They have not entirely lost their confidence in the money-making ability of a circus, but they have deduced from this sad experience that a good deal depends on the season. In the Spring the fickle public's fancy turns to other things than circuses; it is in the Fall that everybody goes to the circus. To everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven: A time to be born and a time to die; a time to weep and a time to laugh; a time to mourn and a time to dance; a time to get and a time to lose; a time to play polo at Burlingame and a time to play baseball in the vacant lot; a time to go to the theatre and a time to go to the circus—and it wasn't the time to go to the circus. So the Fabiola ladies must pocket their loss while the circus folk pocket their profit, if there was any profit—which, in truth, the ladies shrewdly suspect.

It is to be regretted for his own sake that Governor Gillett was unable to invent a better reason for vetoing the bill.

When the Orpheum Opens

The renascence of San Francisco's night life will occur next Monday night when the Orpheum resumes business at the old stand. It will be a great night for vaudeville first-nighters, a night that will be made memorable in the history of new San Francisco, for the opening performance is to be attended with some pomp and a little ceremony. Nothing will be omitted that is available as an aid to the gladsomeness of an occasion which doubtless will be marked by a happy combination of sentiment and enthusiasm. The new Orpheum reflects a great deal of credit on the management. It is one of the best equipped theatres in America. Supplied with every ingenious contrivance that has been designed for the comfort and convenience of theatregoers, this new vaudeville house bespeaks a most praiseworthy disposition to minister to the esthetic sense. It contains much that is pleasing to the eye, but what is more important it does not contain one of the ugliest features of the modern theatre—the drop curtain of commerce. At the new Orpheum you will not be advised between acts to borrow money from Uncle Isaacs; nor will you be informed that your credit is good at Handemedown's Haberdashery. It has remained for vaudeville to innovate with becoming deference to the eternal fitness of things. Let us return thanks to Morris Meyerfeld, the President of

The New Democratic Daily

The long-felt want which is believed to be yawning for a new Democratic daily is actually receiving the serious consideration of some of our illustrious disciples of the Peerless One of Nebraska. The Iroquois braves of California are pining for an organ, one that will dedicate its columns to the inculcation of the revised and amended precepts and maxims of Jeffersonian democracy.

GERTRUDE HOFFMANN'S SALOME

This gifted performer who has been startling theatregoers in the East with her reproduction of the art of Maud Allan was formerly a Tivoli chorus girl. It has been said of her that she has risen on her bare toes to Fame's Gilded Hall.

They realize that the fundamentals of democracy have undergone so many alterations in recent years that it is mighty hard even for the most zealous and vigilant follower of the chameleon-like Prophet of Nebraska to ascertain, without a guide, exactly where he is at. Besides there are many ardent braves abounding in timely sentiments that should be given to the dear people for their edification and instruction and they are panting for a medium of communication between themselves and their constituents. The Hon. Arlecchino Caminetti, the Hon. Max Popper, the Hon. E. P. E. Troy, the Hon. James G. Maguire, the Hon. Theodore Bell—these are some of the little band of faithful patriots, the conspicuous Democrats who are ever bubbling over with burning eloquence. An organ they must have. And they will have it—if they can raise the funds. I am told that Senator Frank G. Newlands has been invited to angel the enterprise, and that he has promised thirty thousand to the fund. The Hon. Theodore Bell, it is currently reported, has promised his support and an occasional editorial. The Hon. Max Popper has promised to take some of the non-assessable stock. It is estimated that the enterprise can be put on its feet for half a million dollars.

Looked Into His Heart and Wrote

From one of Jack London's friends I learn that he is alert in repartee. Said the makings of a Nature-fakir to Jack one day: "You fellows make me tired—you and Ernest Seaton Thompson—going from dog to wolf, and from wolf to dog, harking back all the time on the identical old trail! You ain't half as foxy as you think you are, or you'd take something out of the common to exploit, like me, and not be forever doing the same kind of animals to death. Great Caesar's ghost! but I've a bird of a subject, undone, original, unique; no less than the Life History of a Goose!" "Ah!" said London, "I see—autobiography!"

Good as a Play

Here's a question I've been asked in all seriousness: "Is the Graft Prosecution tragedy, melodrama, comedy, or farce?" In all seriousness I answer: It is not for me to say, but for the future or Omniscience. 'Tis to be noted, however, that my questioner takes it for granted that San Francisco's little family affair, with its flaunting of linen none too clean, and that in the eyes of the world, has in it all the elements of a play of some kind. Plot and counterplot, action and dialogue, suspense and surprise, curtains galore, not a little of that incongruity which is the very essence of humor, villainy and to spare. For hero ever in the center of the stage, who? That also we must needs leave to Omniscience and the future of such heroes. Yet has the play of the Graft Prosecution its hero—in his mouth "sentiments," no end of them, to tickle the ears of the groundlings withal, even the inevitable something to make the judicious grieve. For motive and mainspring of his actions, a desire of the public good that will not be denied; not though the heavens fall. As for his (our hero's) methods, are they not those of highmindedness itself? Of a truth, these be things to thrill, as saith the press agent. Let our playwrights, our Sinclairs and such, get busy!

An Immortal Poet Dead

Algernon Charles Swinburne, the last, and perhaps not the least, of the immortal group of poets that dominated the literature of England in the last half of the last century died last Saturday. The other great poets that marked an epoch in English poetry were Browning, Tennyson, Arnold William Morris and Dante Gabriel Rossetti. Swinburne was the friend and associate of each of these poets, and as a man who made literature the pursuit of his life he ranked with the best of them. With him literature was the first and last joy of his heart. He breathed the pure air and bathed in the golden light that glows on the topmost heights of Parnassus. Literature was his glory and he was her pride. He has entered the real Temple of Fame with the seers and singers of the children of men. The days of Swinburne's literary activity covers an exceptionally long period. His "Bothwell" was published in 1874, and even at that early period he was recognized as a force in English literature. The poem was pronounced the finest that had been published since Byron's death. By that poem he placed himself in the van of modern poets.

His Prose

Like Matthew Arnold, Swinburne was recognized as a great critic. While few poets have put forth higher notes of enchantment still fewer have proved themselves such great masters of prose. Indeed it may be doubted whether Swinburne's verse, full though it is of energy and fire and exhibiting as it does a perfect sense of quantity and music, has the artistic merit of his powerful and trenchant prose. His essays on Victor Hugo, on Baudelaire whom he introduced to England, and on the Elizabethans with whom he saturated himself, are models of lucid prose. But perhaps his most remarkable prose composition is his "Under the Microscope" which has been described as "a rapture of rage unmistakably Swinburnian," and of which it has been said that Junius and even Swift might have been tempted to borrow from such an exhaustless vocabulary of vituperation.

His Opinion of "Laureate" Austin

Written in the plenitude of Swinburne's powers "Under the Microscope" is unsurpassed in literature for bitterness of expression and poignancy of utterance. This mordant philippic gives distinction to one of the most interesting chapters in the history of the quarrels of literary men. It was inspired by Robert Buchanan's "The Fleshly School of Poetry and Other Phenomena of the Day," in which he made a brutal attack on Rossetti, Swinburne and Morris. The mendacious essay embittered Rossetti's life and caused the suppression of an imperishable sonnet and the rewriting of several others in "The House of Life." About the time of Buchanan's attack, Alfred Austin, the present Poet Laureate of England published a book on "The Poetry of the Period," and Swinburne incidentally took occasion to discuss and analyze that gentleman's criticisms, making it evident that he believed Austin to be absolutely insensible of the beauties of poetry. Among other things he said of him: "A man whose ear is conscious of no difference between Offenbach and Beethoven does not usually stand up as a judge of instrumental music; but there is no ear so hirsute or so hard, so pointed or so long, that its wearer will not feel himself qualified to pass sentence on the musical rank of any poet's verse, the relative range and value of his metrical power or skill."

The Snubbing of Lewis

Mr. Alfred Henry Lewis, one of the most distinguished representatives of the newspaper literati has been baring his lacerated sensibilities to the vulgar gaze of the common people. The laceration of Mr. Lewis's sensibilities occurred in Washington, D. C., where he is engaged in chronicling the doings of American statesmen for the enlightenment of the readers of the Hearst newspapers. It appears that the statesmen of the new dispensation, scornful of the most salient of all the late Prophet Roosevelt's policies, prefer to attend to their business in umbrage rather than in the white light that is generated by the Fourth Estate. Even Mr. Taft himself, according to Mr. Lewis, is prejudiced against publicity. Not only has Mr. Taft failed to take Mr. Lewis into his confidence; he has been so discourteous as to exclude this journalistic heavyweight and all his confreres from the conferences of the Cabinet. Hence the quivering of Mr. Lewis's tortured sensibilities. Hear him writhe: "For myself, I always suspect a government official who skulks and hides and loses his voice. After twenty years experience I am prepared to say that I never knew one who did who wasn't either rogue or fool." Put that in your pipe and smoke it, Mr. Taft. Mr. Lewis is not to be snubbed with impunity. Mr. Lewis is learned in history and he can swat his enemies with classical allusions. "Drusus, the consul," he tells us, "said to his architect, 'Build my house so that any Roman may see any act of my life.'" Not a very shrewd citation however, for it only reminds us that the demagogues of ancient Rome were the prototypes of our own crafty knaves. Drusus, we learn from Plutarch and others, was one of the worst of hypocrites. He spent most of his time, says Plutarch, trying "to outdo Caius Gracchus in cajoling the populace with obsequious flattery and every kind of gratifications." When Gracchus divided the public land among the poor charging them with a small rent Drusus exempted them from paying any rent. And all the while that Drusus was cajoling the plain people he was playing into the hands of the aristocracy. He was the first politician skilled in the art of playing both ends against the middle.

Gouging the Consumer

Tinkering with the tariff is a mighty expensive occupation. It is conservatively estimated that every day of delay in the enactment of the tariff bill into law costs the people of the United States at least $10,000,000. And yet our statesmen in Washington are so slow in coming to an agreement that Representative Tawney, in a pessimistic mood, the despatches tell us, has telegraphed home to Minnesota for his summer clothes. In the opinion of the ultimate consumer it is not of primary importance just what the rates in particular schedules may be. It is of the highest importance that the tariff bill should be spread on the statute books that it may adjust itself to the changed conditions. Until business knows just what it is to meet in this regard industrial and commercial activities will be suspended. The supposition is prevalent that the ultimate consumer is eager to know how the schedules will affect his cost of living. Now as a matter of fact the ultimate consumer is not so deeply concerned as he imagines. This fact is illustrated in the cost of coffee which is introduced in this country at eight and a half cents a pound. It gets to the consumer at thirty-five cents a pound. Who does the milking and where does the profit go? Nobody knows. In this connection it may be interesting to learn that when the Pure Food law was passed requiring coffee like other articles to be labelled correctly, if labelled at all as to the place of origin, merchants who had been selling Mocha and Java coffee which came from Brazil ceased doing that, and, in order to get the higher price, put on fancy names, and now nearly all the coffee which housewives buy is plain Rio coffee in packages alluringly labelled for the deception of the unwary. The same coffee can be bought in the market under the proper name for it at a very much lower price. In the original Payne bill there was a tax of 8 cents on tea. The explanation is that the Ways and Means Committee found that 100,000,000 pounds of tea which had been laid down in New York in the last several years at an average to the importer of 16 cents per pound brought in the market anywhere from 40 cents to $1.25 per pound, showing that between the importer and the ultimate consumer somebody was making an enormous profit. The committee came to the conclusion, therefore, that the price of tea is now so high and the profits so large that any duty which might be levied would be far more likely to come out of the present profit than out of the ultimate consumer.

The Glass Case

The reversal of the Glass case caused no surprise in legal circles. It may be doubted whether it caused any surprise among the men that prosecuted Glass, for when Glass was tried it was fondly believed that all the judges in the State were in a state of panic. It was believed that as Glass had been adjudged guilty by the lords of the municipality a trial was merely in the nature of a formality to be indulged by way of concession to an absurd sentiment. The defendant, it will be remembered, was tried before that Daniel of the bench, the Hon. William P. Lawlor when the G. P. was in flower; when the moral issue as defined by the Tartuffes of the reform dispensation was paramount, and when some of our juridical officers were as eager as some of the divinely appointed guardians of the civic well-being to gratify the rampant spirit of revenge. It will be remembered that the mob almost crowded the jury out of the box and that the prosecutors most vociferous periods were applauded by the gallery. It is well to remember all these things, for the hideous obsession has not yet relaxed. Perhaps some day it will dawn on the dull perceptive faculties of the taxpayers who are paying the piper that politicians are expensive luxuries on the bench. What the taxpayers will do when they wake up and learn something of the tricks that have been played on them, is a matter that supplies excellent material for speculation.

The Late F. Marion Crawford

Though Francis Marion Crawford who died last week is best known, and will probably be remembered chiefly, as a novelist, he was the author of some pretty solid works, among them being the "Life of Pope Leo XIII," "Ave Roma Immortalis" and a "History of Rome in the Middle Ages" which is not yet complete. In this work he had as a collaborator Professor Giuseppe Thomassetti. Though Crawford was born in Italy, and received the greater portion of his education abroad where he made his home he never ceased to regard himself as an American, and no one would have for a moment assumed that he was anything else. His mother was a sister of Sam Ward and Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, and his father was Thomas Crawford, the sculptor, who, among other things, was the designer of the magnificent bronze doors of the Capitol at Washington; in one of the panels of which he fashioned a likeness of his wife and one of his daughters. Crawford was a tireless and methodical worker, busy all the year round, whether at his home at Sorento, on his travels, or during his annual visits to this country. Some inquisitive person, seeing him engaged with his pen while crossing the Atlantic, impertinently asked him why he worked so hard, to which he made reply brief and to the point—"To make a living." At another time, a youthful product of a culturine club asked him: "Have you written anything that will live after you are gone?" I don't know," was his answer, "for, you see, what I am after is something that will enable me to live while I am here."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks

The stock market while quite active during the past week was devoid of special features. Union Pacific advanced to 189¾, a new high record. Southern Pacific was less active than usual, but the undertone was strong. New York Central was actively traded in, advancing to 132. The advance was attributed to the good showing made in earnings and reduced operating expenses. Atchison has been well bought and would respond quickly to any favorable market conditions. The Steel stocks have shown strength, notwithstanding Mr. Schwab's bearish views regarding steel conditions. Schwab sometimes voices more than his prayers, especially if he is on the wrong side of the market. The Gould shares have shown reasonable strength of late. Denver & Rio Grande Common and Preferred have been unusually active. It has been well known for a long time that a very strong pool exists in these securities, headed by Edwin Hawley, who has been a prominent market leader. Hawley's thorough knowledge of the geography of the country and his experience in traffic affairs thoroughly fit him for the position he has taken up. Hawley's attention appears to be given to properties which are closely connected with the Gould System. The Industrial list, while showing firmness was lacking any special features. Peoples Gas has been placed upon a 7 per cent dividend basis. Consolidated Gas has received good support of late, indications point to higher prices for this stock. Special advices from E. F. Hutton & Co.'s Washington, D. C. office, say the Reading decision will no doubt be favorable. This is the one unfavorable thing hanging over the market. The high prices for farm products are not taken as showing a shortage in crops in this country, but rather that European requirements are more urgent than for many years. Foreigners are also bidding strongly for raw cotton. All these conditions do not argue lower prices for our good securities. It wont be long before our farming interests will look to railway securities for their investments. Then we shall hear less of the Great Monopolies. Conditions are rapidly shaping themselves for a readjustment of sentiment. The transportation interests and the public are getting closer to each other every hour. It is easier to reach the ear of a railway president now than it was to get an audience with a division superintendent a few years ago. It only proves civilization has not yet completed its work. The future seems bright. I can see only a higher range of values for the future.

Cotton

The steady and continuous advance the past week was not entirely due to drouth in Texas although this was a contributor to the news that went to make up bullish sentiment. It so happens that the facts on which the market has advanced and on which the bulls base a campaign for a still further advance are simple and well defined, circled about with nothing abstruse. Briefly, they come under two heads—one relating to consumption of the old crop, the other to growth of the new. In the first there was clearly and without contradiction a change for the better, because in every important trade center an improved demand for cotton goods was admitted. Manchester, which has been the prize disseminator of indigo news, came out in jaunty spring colors in which blue was not prominent. India came in for unexpected quantities of goods and so revived the downcast countenance of the market that in some quarters actual price advances were secured. Simultaneously the German news, which has almost rivaled that of England for pessimism, improved notably. The export demand for China, which has been the leading feature of American markets for two months, continued, so that all points, like Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch, without a harelip, had something to be thankful for. Spot Sales at all Southern points were materially larger, and prices benefited also in proportion to the enlarged inquiry. News relating to the new crop as it came into the market ways was bullish. A late crop in Texas is now regarded as practically certain, and unless the weather soon improves a comparatively short crop will also be indicated; in fact, all conditions and prospects up to now are so dissimilar from last year that no promises for a bumper crop can be held out with any regard for truthfulness. From present appearances a decrease of 1,000,000 bales in Texas and Georgia is by no means improbable. It is interesting to note that the turning point has been reached at Liverpool, where stocks for the second time in many weeks shows a decrease in American, as well as East Indian and other kinds. The interior towns lost 30,000 bales, and exports at the ports were 40,000 bales in excess of receipts, and it is the opinion of some usually well-informed traders that American needs during the balance of the season will take care of the Cotton remaining in the courty, and if this is approximately true further exports must inevitably impose hardships on the home consumer who is not yet supplied.

Grain

The earlier events of the week and the news from day to day led up to just such a bull situation as developed suddenly before the close of the week. The bull leaders led the activity in July, September and December. Shorts had tried hard to break the market the first part of the week and were punished, and naturally helped the advance along later trying to cover. An experienced crop observer in the southwest wired that half the State of Missouri at least will abandon half the fields because of poor promise. The foreign news is bullish. Of course, this violent advance has put the market to a point where buyers will do well to exercise great caution. At the same time the features which developed in this market Monday and Tuesday will have their influence on prices the world over and the bull campaign is likely to continue although reactions more violent than we have had may be seen.

The Taylor-Zane Scandal

Whatever else may be truthfully said of Marie Zane and Northrup Cowles it certainly does them injustice to charge them with having entered into the marriage relation and withdrawn therefrom at the instigation and for the benefit of Talbot Taylor. The marriage and divorce of Marie Zane and Northrup Cowles took place long before the Californian girl met Talbot Taylor. She was married in New York in the early part of the year 1902. The marriage was a sensational episode, the story of which was printed in this paper with all the interesting details. Likewise it was in this paper that the story of her first meeting with Talbot Taylor was told. That meeting occurred less than two years ago at a house party at Cedarhurst. Taylor exhibited a passionate fondness for the bewitching Marie at first sight, and his feelings becoming obvious to his wife the house party almost broke up in a row.

The Boyish Boston Girl

With the exit of the English polo team to foreign parts Burlingame would once more have resumed its Sabbath calm were it not for the presence of the distinguished and unique Miss Eleanor Sears of Boston, the "horsiest" young lady that ever rode to hounds or jumped a hurdle. Miss Sears, despite her boyish ways and her penchant for the sports of men, is really a most attractive girl with all the graces of heart of the most lovable of her sex. In a dinner gown she is not at her ease, but in the saddle or engaged in any athletic pastime she is at her best, and she always cuts a picturesque figure in her neat mannish costume. Last Saturday all Burlingame sat up and took notice when she arrived at the polo game in short overcoat and knee breeches and with a masculine nod here and there threw herself flat on her back on the grass to watch the game. She whistled like a boy and cheered the players on to victory. Incidentally she shouted to Walter Hobart the startling news of an accident of a strictly personal nature with reference to her costume which almost took that gentleman off his feet. After the game she "stood treat" like one of the boys. Last week the reluctant polo enthusiasts permitted the dashing Eleanor to take a hand in the sport, and I hear that she played a dandy game.

The Kiss of the Polo Game

By the way, it was not Miss Sears, as has been currently reported, that Walter Hobart kissed in the presence of the multitude. The fair one was Miss Virginia Joliffe. Why the episode should have occasioned so much discussion I am at a loss to understand. Is there such a premium on hypocrisy as to make it worth while for us to pretend that we are shocked at the most trivial and harmless of pranks? Perhaps the grand stand at a polo game is not the most suitable place in the world for an osculatory performance, but at this late date it is hardly reasonable to expect Walter Hobart to exhibit a becoming deference to the proprieties. Furthermore, as one of the heroes of the day he was entitled to indulgence, and I am sure that if promised the kiss in the event of victory the spirit that prompted the promise is rather to be glorified than censured. It is the spirit that has inspired the songs of the noblest poets and the deeds of the greatest heroes of romance.

Below the Standard

Mrs. Vincent Whitney, I understand, has decided to spend the summer in town, and in connection with her decision there is an amusing little story at her expense. It seems that a certain wealthy woman not in the swim was desirous of renting her beautiful home during her absence for a few months' sojourn in Dresden. In response to her advertisement, there came, amongst other prospective tenants, Mrs. Vincent Whitney. After a complete exploration of the premises, Mrs. Whitney decided to take the place and to clinch her bargain then and there. But first she must be catechised by the owner of the house: "Mrs. Whitney, I do not mean to pry into your affairs at all, but how many servants do you keep?" "Oh," said Mrs. Whitney, "I keep two; you know Mr. Whitney and I are out so much—we are always dining at the homes of friends or in cafes, you know—that really the cook hasn't anything to do, and she tends to down stairs, and of course there's the nurse for the two babies, but we're out all the time, and really—What rent are you asking, by the way?" "I have been asking one hundred and seventy-five dollars a month," answered the prospective land lady, "but I would consider any suitable offer from the right person." "Well," said Mrs. Whitney, with elaborate caution, "I will consult my husband and let you know our decision—" "Pray, do not trouble," was the unexpected response, "for I could not think of renting my house to any one who keeps only two servants." And Mrs. Whitney beat a hasty retreat.

Exit, the Sharons

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Sharon, accompanied by their daughter, Miss Florence Breckenridge, left last Monday on the Limited for a short visit to Europe. They will spend the summer abroad, returning to San Francisco in the fall, in time to be present at the opening of the new Palace, in which Mr. Sharon is deeply interested, not only financially but sentimentally. It was his father who, in 1875, came to the rescue and completed the famous old Palace, which he opened and started successfully. On that occasion he made a speech which was quite the hit of the evening. Fred Sharon says there is nothing that could persuade him to stay away from this second opening, but he does not promise to furnish a speech. The Sharons held quite a large informal reception in the Laurel Court on Sunday afternoon. They will be missed by the social set, for they entertained much and often during the winter, both at the Fairmont and at their own home in Menlo Park. Amongst those who gathered to bid them farewell were Mr. and Mrs. William Tevis, Mrs. Gordon Blanding, Mr. and Mrs. Dixwell Hewitt, Dr. and Mrs. McMonagle, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Mendell, Mr. and Mrs. George Kelham, Dr. and Mrs. Harry Selfridge, Miss Mary Keeney, Miss Augusta Foute, Miss Innes Keeney, Samuel Hamilton, Frank King and William Berry.

A Social War South of Us

The revolution which threatened to disrupt society down the peninsula has been averted after all, and instead of battle, murder and sudden death, all is quiet and serene. The would-be combatants admit now that it was all a mistake, but there was a time when it looked as though a proposal to arbitrate would have precipitated hostilities. Burlingame was prepared to wipe San Mateo off its social map, and San Mateo was equally ready to assert its ignorance of even the name of Burlingame. Like most social wars, the origin of the disagreement was trivial enough, and nothing more serious than a slight difference of opinion. It seems that, according to the views of some, the Burlingame men made themselves too much at home in El Cerrito Club, where they were exempt from dues as they were not members. The San Mateoites, who lent their financial support to both clubs felt that they were being imposed upon and took no pains to conceal their feelings. That is one version. Another is that Burlingame butted in to a private polo game on El Cerrito field and resented the intimation that their company was not desired. When the San Mateoites rose in their wrath and ordered them to decamp the Blingumites refused to go, and the more they were urged the more stubbornly they determined to remain. Then San Mateo decided to build a high wall around their field so that Burlingame should not enjoy even a look over the top, and its guarded gate was to give admittance to none not provided with an invitation or protected by the password. San Mateo was represented by the Tobins while Francis Carolan was official spokesman for Burlingame, and there were no signs of a truce. When the English team came north, however, it was the guest of both clubs, and for decency's sake the signs of strife had to be concealed. Since their departure there has been no digging up of the war hatchet, and either a permanent treaty of peace, satisfactory to both parties, has been signed, or else they have decided that it was all a mistake and best forgotten, for at the polo game last Sunday the Burlingame men were the guests of San Mateo, and the clouds of fragrant smoke which ascended from the clubhouse porch gave evidence that the pipe of peace had been circulated.

The Newhall-McBean Wedding

Mr. and Mrs. George A. Newhall were hosts at an elaborate dinner recently, in honor of Athole McBean and their daughter, Miss Margaret, whose wedding will take place on the twelfth of May. Very little preliminary entertaining has been done for Miss Newhall. Very sensibly she has impressed it on her friends that she wished to set out upon her European tour free from the fatigues of a rush season. It had been her desire to set the day for her marriage for the fifteenth of May, that being the twenty-sixth anniversary of the wedding of her parents. Sentiment, however, was obliged to give way to stern realities, for Mr. McBean is obliged to make trips to Portland and Los Angeles, and there is an excursion to leave on the fifteenth, and in order to avoid all these things the date was set on the twelfth rather than the fifteenth. The wedding will be celebrated at Trinity Church, at high noon. The bride will be attended by her sister, Miss Marion Newhall, while Miss Elizabeth Newhall, Miss Maud Bourn, Miss Marjory Josselyn and Miss Helen Cheesborough will serve as bridesmaids. Laurence Scott will be best man, and among the ushers will be Charles Page, Mr. Lowery and Arthur Cheesborough. A reception, for which two hundred and fifty invitations have been issued will follow the ceremony, at the Newhall residence. A generous check has already been the gift of the bride's father. The wedding tour, which will be prolonged until August, will include a trip through England, France and Switzerland by automobile. Gossip is connecting the name of the bride's charming youngest sister with that of an eligible parti, but neither the two who are most affected nor any of the others of the family will commit themselves.

The Chauffeur in Society

In these days of trustbusting and class hatreds it is perhaps but natural that our aristocracy should seek to conciliate the proletariat by the affectation of a democratic spirit. This by way of reply to a correspondent who asks me what I think of the practice that has been introduced in the exclusive set that has its headquarters in Burlingame, the practice of employing a chauffeur for his companionship while lunching in a fashionable hotel dining room. I think it's all right, especially in these piping times of pernicious demagoguery. At the same time I realize that the chauffeur is in a class by himself, and that he is regarded by women as a character possessing something of romantic interest. The fact is that the chauffeur has been admitted to society. He should be a hero to the lady whose auto he drives.

Successful Collaboration of Californians

From New York comes the news that the play sired by Elmer Harris and conceived by Geraldine Bonner has proved worthy of its distinguished parents. The play is called "Sham." It was produced at Wallack's Theatre by Henrietta Crossman who has found it a most satisfactory medium for the display of her talents. This play is Miss Bonner's first essay in the field of dramaturgy. The supposition is that she invented the plot and that Mr. Harris provided the technique. Mr. Harris is the young man from Berkeley who used to regale the highbrows of the college town with lectures on Ibsen. He was known in Berkeley as a playwright, and it was currently reported that he had a trunkful of plays that he had dashed off in his leisure moments, but until "Sham" saw the light his claims to recognition as a dramatist seemed somewhat shadowy.

A New Honor for Polk

When Willis Polk, child of the Muses, designer of things beautiful and builder of monumental structures in steel and stone, returned from Portland the other day, a new honor sat lightly on his graceful shoulders. He had visited Portland to attend the annual exhibition of the Architectural Club of that city which attracted architects from all the principal coast cities. One day the architects got together, organized the Architectural League of the Pacific Coast and elected Willis Polk president. Honors have been crowding on Polk of late, but he is still able to look down from the tallest of the skyscrapers that are monuments to his genius without exhibiting symptoms of dizziness.

Zwerin-Mendelson Engagement

The engagement of Miss Lillie Zwerin and Mr. I. Mendelson has been announced. Miss Zwerin is the daughter of the Joseph Zwerins, and she is very popular in the younger social set. Mr. Mendelson is Pacific Coast manager of the Australian Woolen Mills, and a prominent Mason. Though no date has been set for the wedding it is understood that the marriage will take place in June.

At Del Monte

Over a hundred and fifty easterners arrived at Del Monte last Thursday and remained during the Easter holidays. Many of the parties are composed of young people, and outdoor amusements claim their attention. Motoring trips, horseback excursions and picnics, with plenty of golf, tennis, and in these warm days, swimming, give them occupation every hour of the day. On Saturday nights an informal dance is held in the great ball room and art gallery, and the proximity of the Presidio at Monterey brings the glitter of brass buttons to these impromptu affairs. Not all of the buttons return however, for many a one is transformed into a hat pin and goes gaily across the continent, convoying the milinery of some eastern belle. * * * Mr. and Mrs. Mace Greenleaf, with Mrs. M. E. Boschke of Los Angeles, are at Del Monte. Mrs. Greenleaf will be remembered as the dashing Mrs. Bradbury, whose marriage to the southern matinee idol followed a brief whirlwind courtship. The story is that while listening to the actor's impassioned rendering of Romeo, Mrs. Bradbury leaned forward and murmured, "Oh for a lover like that!" Two weeks later their wedding bells were rung. Mrs. Bradbury's gowns and hats and French parasols are bewilderingly beautiful creations, and she has them in profusion.

A Californian Celebration

Exiled Californians, visiting or resident in New York, are going to celebrate "Three Years Afterward" next Sunday, by a Dutch Treat Dinner at Reisenweber's, 987 Eighth avenue, Columbia Circle, at half past six in the evening. It is to be a California dinner in every respect, though not confined exclusively to Californians. The idea is to get together informally and celebrate the regeneration of San Francisco. The Golden Gate Professional Club will hold its monthly dinner at the same time and place and provide some entertainment, and there will be, doubtless, an interesting number of reminiscences of the day when San Franciscans went dinnerless and entertainment of any kind was the last thing that troubled their minds.

In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. John A. Darling has taken possession of her new home, 3945 Clay street, and will be at home Wednesdays.

The Easter services at Trinity Church were well attended, and a number of society's attractive debutantes, with their most devoted swains and newest costumes were in evidence. Noticeable amongst them were Miss Peggy Simpson and Miss Innes Keeney, in pretty light gowns, and hats, and most wonderful orchids. There is general regret in society that Mrs. Charles M. Keeney intends to spirit away her charming daughter for visits to relatives in Louisville and New York, but Miss Innes has exacted a promise from her mother that she shall return before the winter is over.

Frank Michels, bon vivant and epicure, gave a dinner at the Fairmont on Saturday in honor of Colonel John C. Kirkpatrick, general manager of the Palace Hotel Company. It was a "stag" affair and was in the nature of a farewell to the Colonel, who left on the 11th for Europe to complete the purchasing of bric-a-brac for the new Palace. Colonel Kirkpatrick is perhaps the best known hotel man in America.

A quiet but socially important wedding will be celebrated on the twentieth of April, between Miss Grace Baldwin and Russell Selfridge. Miss Baldwin is the clever daughter of the late Lloyd Baldwin, the well-known land lawyer, and a prominent member of the Spinners' Club. Mr. Selfridge is a son of Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Selfridge. The deplorable accident by which Lieutenant Thomas Selfridge, U. S. A., recently lost his life, is still fresh in the minds of the public, and it is on this account that the wedding will be quiet and invitations confined to the relatives and very intimate friends only. Lloyd Baldwin Jr. is to be married this summer to Miss Edith Berry, who will shortly return from New York.

Mrs. Hugh Glenn French was hostess at a tea on April 14, in honor of Mrs. Langworthy Argall.

Mrs. John Kitchen, wife of the mining man, who is now manager of the Charles Schwab mines at Tonopah, is visiting her sister, Mrs. Brontie Aikins. Much entertaining will take place while she is here.

Lieutenant Harrison Thurman Bane, U. S. A., has been ordered to Sequoia Park on April 20, were he will remain until October. His marriage with Miss Bessie-Louise Dichman will take place this summer.

On Saturday afternoon last a fashionable crowd gathered at the residence of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, to listen, at her special request, to a lecture by M. Marcel Poete, Inspector of the Libraries of Paris, on "L'Image de Paris au Temps de la Revolution." To those who were in touch with the subject and familiar with the language the occasion was, I am told, extremely interesting, but several of the most prominent guests, whose French was a minus quantity, utilized the opportunity in making notes on the newest Easter fashions, to the amusement or annoyance of those more cultured.

Mr. Alfred Meyerstein motored to Byron Springs for Easter with a party of friends, among whom were Miss Bernice Smith, Mr. Stewart McNab and the Frank Kerrigans.

Though Lent was a sedative to local society it was far from being a soporific, for luncheons and teas were as numerous as ever. Amongst the pleasant affairs of the past week at the St. Francis were Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hobart's luncheon on Monday; Charles Templeton Crocker's informal luncheon for the Huhns of Philadelphia and a number of friends in from the polo games; Mrs. William Kaufman's entertainment of a dozen friends on Wednesday afternoon; a pretty and quiet luncheon given by Mr. and Mrs. Irving Wright in honor of Mrs. Thomas

FIX DATE FOR OPENING

It is the intention of the United States Sanitarium Company to open the Emanuel Sanitarium at Glen Ellen, Sonoma County, June 1. Rapid progress is being made in the erection and furnishing of "The White City" that patients and guests may obtain treatment and accmmodation by the time the early summer buds burst into flower. Emanuel Cottage, the largest of the new buildings, though modestly named has as many rooms as a good sized hotel and is to be equally elaborate in appointments. Other new cottages are springing up here and there among the trees and shrubbery, their spotless white a vivid contrast in the green foliage. Soon all will be in readiness to receive those who have ills to cure or time to kill. And in the killing of time "The White City" offers such a variety of methods that the homicide is justifiable. The slothful ease of the hammock or the lounging chair on the verandas or in the grounds, idly drifting on the river in boat or canoe, dozing, dreaming. Riding on the finest of Kentucky mounts along the bridle paths or in the tan cork rink. Playing anything from foot ball to croquet or from base ball or cricket to golf. Driving "Bubbling,"—every sport but snow balling, tobagganing and skating. Time would surely find it a pleasant death at Glen Ellen. Under the direction of a medical superintendent various special practitioners will devote their time and knowledge to bringing back health to those who go to the Emanuel Sanitarium seeking it and acting with them in old Dame Nature who equipped the location for its purpose, with medicinal springs, trees, flowers, birds, pure air and all the other remedies of her pharmacopia long ago as the world began.

"The Honor of the Family"

Otis Skinner's "Colonel Brideau" is the most virile role that has been acted for many a day. Put together all the swaggering, blustering dare devil characters on the boards plus a something individual and original that belongs to Skinner himself and you have Philippe Brideau. The story is a duel to the death between a cool, insolent fearless man and a siren gifted with wit, beauty and boldness. The stake is the Honor of the Family, or, more properly speaking, the fortune of a doting old miser. The first act finds Flora the "gutter girl" mistress of the situation. She has the old uncle Rouget and his household completely under her thumb, and only waits for the moment when his entire fortune shall fall into her hands to elope with her lover, Commandant Max Gilet. Into this state of affairs the Colonel bursts like a whirl wind. His bluster, his rakish swagger, his insolent and brutal frankness announce him to Flora as a force to be reckoned with, and she sets her art, her beauty and her wit against him. But the Colonel is not to be melted by a pretty woman's tears, and he had had too much experience with the sex not to understand her falsities and flatteries, so the duel is fought to a finish. The lover is mortally wounded by Philippe, the family fortune is saved, the siren driven out of the house, the Honor of the Family is intact, and the Colonel remains master of the field. The action is swift and impelling, the dialogue incisive and cutting, and the two combined sweep you off your feet. When you recover yourself you realize what an unlovely story it is, how sordid and lacking in sentiment. The old uncle is repulsive in his senility, the girl has not a redeeming quality, if it be not her love for Max, and Philippe Brideau is too much like Satan rebuking sin. Otis Skinner has a rich vein of humor and jollity underlying the other elements of his characterization and saving it from actual cynicism. In the hands of an actor lacking this quality the part of Philippe Brideau would be grim and repulsive. As it is laughter comes to the relief of a too tense situation, and by a flash of comedy the tragic forces are averted. Mr. Skinner is fortunate in having a leading woman who seconds him ably. Miss Percy Haswell is an actress of unusual intelligence. Her interpretation of Flora could only be given by a brainy woman. She does not lose one point in portraying the cruel catlike adventuress, yet she is never sensual either in her love scenes with Max or when she throws her self into the arms of her enemy, the Colonel. She never forgets her own interest or allows herself to be carried too far. She is too hard and shrewish to arouse sympathy, even in the last act where she learns the death of her lover. She is worsted in the battle of wits between herself and Philippe because his weapons are better and he knows better how to use them. A. G. Andrews as old Rouget achieves a triumph of acting and make up. His limp, his pallor, his senility offer a picture of most unlovely old age. Mr. Skinner has excellent support throughout. The subordinate characters are in good hands, and contribute to a most artistic whole. There is a unity about the performance most unusual in theatrical productions.

Barrie's "Peter Pan"

"Peter Pan," you will say on reflection, is a rather hazardous venture for a stock company. It involves so much detail peculiar to itself and calls for so much of a peculiar kind of temperament and so much of a singular kind of talent. Go to the Valencia Theatre and spend an afternoon or evening with Barrie and you will find that the difficulties upon which you have reflected have been overcome. The spirit of fantasy animates this stock production. The eerieness of the play, its emotional charm, its affecting sentimentality—all its salient qualities, are realized to the full. A most fascinating performance is that which the Valencia players give, touching effectively the hearts of young and old. "Peter Pan" is supposed to be a play for children, but I am of the opinion that the little ones are less deeply affected by its quaint conceits than their elders. Moreover, I suspect that the average grown-up who goes to see "Peter Pan" ostensibly for the sake of the children, is far from being personally disinterested. Children are less easily affected by Barrie's sentimentality than are their elders. The fact is that "Peter Pan" appeals both to children and adults, and that is why it is one of the most successful of Barrie's plays. Barrie's humor compels the laughter of both old and young, and his sentiment moves even the unemotional to tears. The cast at the Valencia is uniformly good. George Foster Platt, the Valencia's stage director, has certainly demonstrated by this production that he is a master in his profession. The play will run all next week.

The Drama of the Year

One of the valuable plays secured exclusively by Frederic Belasco since he went to New York is "The Regeneration," which will be given its first presentation by a stock company next Monday evening at the Alcazar. Early this season it was produced in Wallack's Theatre by Liebler & Company, the original cast including Arnold Daly, Edwin Arden and Helen Ware. It made a tremendous hit both in New York and Philadelphia, the critics pronouncing it the drama of the year. A play of ethics only, its subject matter is taken entirely from the palpitating hive of social pariahs, the New York Bowery. The principal characters, excepting, of course, the nobly-inspired, self-sacrificing settlement worker, are Bowery types. The play mirrors in realistic fashion a phase of life which all students of sociology love to study. With the very rise of the curtain we are introduced into a den of thugs. Of this gang Owen Conway is the leader. The plot deals with the struggle involving his regeneration, a struggle between two women, one good and pure, the other a daughter of the slums. This struggle is one that supplies the motive for much spirited action and considerable heart interest.

Dr. Ludwig Wullner—Sensational Lieder Singer

whole world, singer and musician, has been one of the two sensational successes of musical season in this country, the other being Mischa Elman. In some respects the Wullner furor is the more surprising for Elman came with the greatest of heralding and everyone expected to hear a genius and no one was disappointed, but with Wullner whose name was never heard of in this country until a few months before his appearances the music lovers of New York did not know just what to look for and when the wonderful artist did such work that his audience of three hundred grew to audiences of four and five thousand and the number of concerts planned for New York grew from three to seventeen the entire country began clamoring for Ludwig Wullner. Manager Will Greenbaum has engaged this singer for three recitals in which he will be accompanied by Coenraad V. Bos whose playing of the accompaniments has created but little less enthusiasm than Wullner's interpretation of the great classic songs. The dates will be Tuesday and Thursday nights, April 27 and 29, and a special matinee on Friday afternoon, April 30, at 3:30. The concerts will be given at the Garrick Theatre, and seats will be ready next Wednesday morning at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s. Special season tickets will be sold to those desiring to hear all the programs.

Don't wait till you own an auto. Take a trip through the Santa Clara Valley and into the foothills on interurban electric cars. Start from Market Street Depot, San Jose.

The Robley D. Evans' Lecture

Sunday afternoon at Dreamland Rink, Rear-Admiral Robley D. Evans will give his last lecture in this city, the subject being "The War With Spain." No man in the country knows more about the many thrilling incidents of the great naval campaign in the West Indies, and, as told in "Fighting Bob's" inimitable style the story is most fascinating. Seats may be secured at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s until Saturday evening at five and on Sunday the box office will open at the rink at 10 o'clock. Next Monday night, April 19th, Admiral Evans will lecture in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse on "The Voyage to San Francisco with the Fleet."

The Umpire Gets the Decision

The production of the musical comedy, "The Umpire," has resulted in the greatest success the Princess has ever had. This may sound like extravagant praise when the number of triumphs this theatre has been the scene of are remembered but, nevertheless, it is strictly within the bounds of truth. In musical comedy one never looks for a plot or at least a lucid one and to say that "The

BURTON HOLMES and WRIGHT KRAMER

Umpire" possesses this would hardly be accurate, but it contains an exceedingly clever and amusing idea which the capital company who appear in it thoroughly exhaust. To Fred Mace goes the principal honors. His performance of Jimmie Dolan is simply perfect in its humor and eccentricity. As an unfortunate baseball umpire, who, during the progress of a game in Chicago has his head turned by a pretty face in the grand stand and in consequence gives the decision adverse to the popular side, he is inimitable and his description of this unfortunate incident of his checkered career is every whit as good of its kind as Lady Gay Spanker's account of "The

ROSE SHERIDAN

Who will appear in "Right's Might" at the American Theatre.

Hunt" in London Assurance. The action of the play is in Tangiers, Morocco, which is a sort of Honduras, the safe retreat of criminals of whom the deepest and blackest is considered to be the unfortunate umpire. May Boley is in her element as Maribel Lewton, and her appearance as the quarterback of a football team is one of the hits of the performance. Another of the hits is the attractive girl chorus impersonating the rival teams of Stanford and Berkeley in quite an exciting football scrimmage. Helen Darling is remarkably good as Lady Stella Brighton Fitzhugh and Zoe Barnett creates a very pleasant impression, in spite of the little opportunity afforded her, as Edith Proby. A clever performance of Mazuma, a Moorish woman, is given by Ethel Du Fre Houston. James F. Stevens scores a great lyric hit and his number, "The Sun That Shines on Dixie Land," is encored to a degree that is perfectly unreasonable. Budd Ross, Reginald Travers, Walter Catlett and Oliver Le Noir contribute their share to the success of one the best and most enjoyable entertainments ever presented in this city. In consequence of the enthusiastic reception accorded "The Umpire" it will be continued another week which will positively be its last.

Mischa Elman, the Violin Virtuoso

"Not a prodigy but a genius" is the universal opinion of critics with reference to Mischa Elman, the young Russian lad who at the age of eighteen is considered a master-player of the violin. The greatest works of such composers as Bach, Brahms, Beethoven and Tschaikowsky are what he is asked to play with the world's greatest symphony orchestras—works that take more than a mere virtuoso to interpret, works that take soul, heart and brain to give adequate expression to. Manager Will Greenbaum considers himself indeed fortunate, to be able to announce such an artist for his opening attraction at the first Class A Building ever devoted to the cause of music in this city—the Garrick Theatre. Elman will give his first concert next Tuesday night, April 20, and will play a rarely beautiful program, including Edward Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" in three movements, Handel's "Sonata" in E minor, "Menuett," Beethoven, "Gavotte," Gossec, "German Dance," Dittersdorf, "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj and "Caprice Basque," Sarasate. His second concert will be given Thursday night, April 22, and Mendelssohn's "Concerto," Saint-Saens "Rondo Cappricioso," Corelli's "La Folia" and a group of charming little numbers by Schumann, Schubert, Chopin and Sarasate. An equally fine program will be given Sunday afternoon, April 25. Next Friday afternoon, April 23, Elman will play in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse, repeating the program of his first San Francisco concert.

The Gleason-McGlynn Play

Norman Hackett and his excellent supporting company will present "Classmates" at the American Theatre for the last times this Saturday afternoon and evening and at the Sunday matinee a dramatic event of unusual importance will be ushered in, when "Right's Might," a play by Frank McGlynn and Jack Gleason, will be presented for the first time on any stage. "Right's Might" deals with love, honor and politics and from all accounts is packed full of interest from beginning to end. The big scene of the play is enacted on the floor of the Senate and those who have witnessed rehearsals are unanimously of the opinion that the enthusiasm of the authors and producers of the drama is well justified.

A keen interest is being taken in the play and the demand for seats is large, owing in no small degree to the immense popularity of the authors, it being safe to say that no two men in this city have a larger circle of friends than have Jack Gleason and Frank McGlynn.

Mrs. Ben Lathrop's Concert

Mrs. Ben Lathrop has certainly vindicated her artistic ability. For many years this charming young society matron devoted herself to the most serious study of music and when she determined to adopt the career of a professional concert singer she went for advice to the best critics and masters in New York, and, after singing for them and receiving their assurance of the wisdom of her choice, she made her public debut in that city. Her success was such that a dozen splendid engagements immediately followed, including one as soloist at a Herman Klein "Pop" where the greatest artists are proud to appear. Some weeks ago Mrs. Lathrop returned here to sing before the St. Francis Musical Art Society. She immediately left to fulfill engagements in the South and will return this week, being engaged to give a recital before the pupils of the Dominican Convent at San Rafael. Her only public concert in San Francisco will be given Monday night, April 26th, at the Garrick Theatre, Manager Will Greenbaum's new auditorium for concerts. On this occasion she will sing an exceptionally beautiful program of songs in French, Italian, German and English. She will be assisted in her program by Mr. Carl Grienauer, the famous Viennese violincello virtuoso, who will be remembered here as solo cellist with the original Scheel orchestra and who has since been touring Europe as a star. Mr. Gyula Ormay will be the accompanist.

Back From Berlin

Miss Mary Carrick, the gifted young pianist, whose success in Berlin on the occasion of her debut, was cabled to this city by her manager, Herr Liebling, will appear at a recital on Tuesday evening, April 20, at the St. Francis Hotel. Miss Carrick's musical education was received in this city. She was the recipient of a special gold medal for music at the College of Notre Dame, and afterwards took up her studies with the well-known instructor, Hugo Mansfeldt. Her first appearances will be remembered with pleasure by local music lovers, who will find their expectations fulfilled in the performance of which she gave such promise. Among the gems of piano literature which Miss Carrick will present is Liszt's "Grosses Konzert Solo," which, by a strange coincidence, she had the honor of presenting for the first time to a Berlin audience, as well as of giving it its first hearing in the United States at her first Liszt Concert, a few years ago. Another interesting, but rarely heard composition on the program is the Brahms set of variations on a Theme of Paganini. The Berlin Herald, speaking of her success, said: "Among the many young American pianists who have appeared in Berlin Miss Carrick must be given the lead, not only in the tremendous difficulty of her program, but in the ease and intelligence with which she executed it."

Orpheum Vaudeville

Next week will not only be a red letter one in theatricals but it will also mark an important incident in the rehabilitation of this city, the opening of the new Orpheum on O'Farrell street which is conceded to be the most beautiful and perfectly equipped theatre in America. The program for the coming week will be given next Sunday afternoon and evening at the Ellis Street Orpheum and will be continued Monday night at the new Orpheum. Grigolati's Aerial Ballet, famous all the world over and for several years a feature in Drury Lane Theatre, of "Sleeping Beauty and the Beast," Mr. Bluebeard and "Humpty Dumpty," will make its first appear-

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

We will also start a query column, in which the reader may ask questions pertaining to dress. Such questions will be answered in the following issue.

BRING FORTH YOUR DRESS SUITS AGAIN FOR LENT IS OVER

Evening clothes as usual represent the full dress suit. The Inverness or Chesterfield overcoat, silk hat, poke lap front or round top wing collar, white tie, white waistcoat, white shirt, (plain or pique), with attached cuffs, white kid gloves, black half hose, (silk or lisle), plain or with clock, patent leather shoes with buttoned calf or catch top or pumps, and pearl or moonstone links and studs to match.

Always respect the canons of good form. Don't wear an opera hat for wedding or formal occasions, always the silk hat. Don't wear a lap or wing collar for such affairs; only the poke is proper. At an evening wedding or formal affair a black tie is absolutely out of the question, as it belongs to the Tuxedo, as to pleated shirts, colored waistcoats, colored half hose, oxford shoes, gray or tan gloves or diamond studs or links, set with colored stones. Often a wedding ceremony occurs at five or five-thirty in the afternoon, bringing part of the affair after 6 p. m., which is the dividing hour between day and evening as affecting dress. There is thus created some doubt as to the proprieties. When days are short and lights are on during the ceremony and particularly if a reception immediately follows, the restrictions are waived in favor of the desire to have it take on the nature of an evening affair. The full dress coat would then not only be allowed, but also be more in place than the frock coat. When days are long and no reception follows, it is best to abide by custom and dress for the hour for which the ceremony is set. The Tuxedo while often seen at formal theatre parties is still by careful dressers regarded as wholly an informal garment and not to be thought of except within the intimate home circle, at the club or stag parties or at a theatre party where every body knows the other intimately. The styles of either dress suit or evening suits have changed but slightly, and it is perfectly safe to wear last season's dress suit but should your trousers and waistcoat belonging to your Tuxedo have braid, have same removed, as it has gone out.

"It's deuced hot here," he remarked, opening his fur coat and pulling off his gloves. One of his diamond rings slipped from his finger and fell to the floor.

"I must not lose that," he said; "it is a keepsake from Princess—" He paused, smiling conceitedly.

She started. Impossible! She could not have heard aright.

He twisted the ring slowly down over his finger-joints and eyed its companions lovingly.

"Look at this one here," he began. She interrupted him hastily.

"Do you know our gallery already?" she asked.

"No," he replied and raised his hand to his mouth to stifle a yawn.

"I am intensely sorry, my dear lady," he continued carelessly, but what he was intensely sorry about she was never to know, for suddenly he stopped and clapped his hand to his throat, whence issued two gruesome, gurgling sounds.

"Oh, I've caught cold again!" he cried in alarm, "and tonight I must sing! This change of temperature—I must hurry off or I shall get as hoarse as a crow."

He rose and plunged his right hand into the wide pocket of his overcoat, from which he drew a square, white parcel tied with a pink silk ribbon. He hesitated a moment—again the doubting look—then, as if taking a desperate resolution, he whispered, with a meaning smile:

"And here is what you wanted."

She took the package mechanically. She scarcely dared to move, so ill at ease did she feel.

He seized her hand to say good-bye.

"How dearly I should like to kiss you on the forehead, my darling," he whispered.

"For heaven's sake!" she cried out.

"But there are people here," he continued, with a quiet smile. "Au revoir—tonight at the Opera!"

With that he hurried out.

She started after him as if turned to stone. "Why did he treat me so?" she stammered. How glad would she have been to feel some joy; but she felt more like crying!

Absolutely dazed, she hurried home.

Once there she opened the box.

An intoxicating scent of flowers rose from it. On the top a sheet of paper met her eye, on which were scrawled the words:

Eternal memory of Love's sweet hour.

And underneath, bedded on dark red roses, lay, instead of the fan—a house-key.

tation Building the last word on electric traffic will be said. There will also be in the Transportation Building an exhausive exhibition of electrically propelled automobiles, and on Lake Washington the electric motor boat will be a prominent feature, with everything that is new in the way of storage batteries, dry cells, and all else.

On March 1, three months before the official opening day, Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition was more than ninety per cent complete, assurance positive that when the time comes there will be nothing left undone.

Music will be a feature of the Exposition, and during the season some of the finest organizations in the United States will be heard. Liberatti's, Innes' and Ellery's Bands will divide the season, and one or another will be heard daily. The Temple of Music is centrally located. This is one of the permanent buildings, and is one of the finest halls for the purpose to be found anywhere in the United States. The new organ which has been installed is one of the largest pipe organs yet built, and in tone and possibilities, is not surpassed. Band stands have been erected at various points on the grounds so that music may be heard practically everywhere, but shorter concert seasons have been arranged for bands from foreign countries, as well as for vocal and solo instrumental concerts. These latter will be held, as a rule, in the auditorium. Among the novelties are the National Band of Mexico and the famous Philippine Constabulary Band. A specially attractive novelty will be a concert by a native Philippine band, whose instruments are composed entirely of bamboo. The range and class of music produced by these rudely constructed instruments, and their crude appearance as contrasted with the equipment of the other bands will be in itself an instructive feature.

Nature has been a valuable assistant at the laying out of the Exposition grounds. The vast amphitheater, which will be the scene of many interesting events, has required but little more than the labor of placing seats. It is one of the most beautiful natural theaters in the world. It was here that the first shovelful of earth was removed in beginning work for the fair, but even before anything whatever was done, there was accommodation for fully twenty-five thousand people. On the precipitous shore of Lake Washington, looking across a succession of bays the snow-capped peaks of the Cascades are brought into view, and this forms the background of the amphitheater stage. Three sides, with a stately upward slope rise from the floor to towering trees of Douglas fir, cedar and pine, and the natural acoustic effects are such as are looked for only in buildings constructed with this special property in mind. Chairs have been placed around the tiered sides of this natural out-door theater, and thirty thousand spectators may enjoy at once comfortable positions, unexampled scenery, and the spectacle provided for their interest.

ance in the most effective of its divertisements commencing with a Butterfly Ballet by Mlle. Floretta, the premiere aerial coryphee and concluding with a dove ballet in which live doves are used for the final pictures and effects. A Great Shakespearean Festival

Manager Will Greenbaum promises a week of Shakespearean productions with the appropriate music interpreted by a glorious symphony orchestra. The actors will be the Ben Greet English Company numbering over thirty players, singers, dancers and pantomimists under the personal direction of Ben Greet. The orchestra will be the famous Russian Symphony Orchestra of New York under the direction of Modest Altschuler. Over one hundred people will be employed in the magnificent performances. The season will open Monday, May 3, and the repertoire will include "A Midsummer Night's Dream" with Mendelssohn's music; "The Tempest" with Tschaikowsky's and Arthur Sullivan's music; "Romeo and Juliet" with Tschaikowsky's and Gounod's music, and "Merry Wives of Windsor" with Nicolai's setting. Two special performances will be given at the Greek Theatre in Berkeley on Saturday night, May 1, and Sunday afternoon May 8.

Burton Holmes' Travalogues

Burton Holmes "Travalogues" are a regular feature of the amusement season in the larger cities of the east. They do not come strictly under the head of amusement, but are rather of the instructive order, equally appreciated as a stimulus to those who are contemplating trips abroad and to those who, having made foreign tours, enjoy the reminiscences of their journeys, while, to that large class for whom traveling must be of the mental order, there is nothing better. Virtually they are mammoth illustrations to books of travel. One may carry away from one of these lecture courses quite as much as the average globe trotter has in his mind after undergoing all the fatigues and inconveniences of the real trip. Berlin, Paris, Vienna, London, and the little known Fez, the capital of Morocco are the treats offered, and the courses are so arranged that two evenings a week are all that will be monopolized for the whole series. The sale of course seats will open Tuesday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s. The lectures will be delivere by Mr. Wright Kramer, the traveling companion of Mr. Holmes for many years. A course of three Travalogues, the first to be given in Oakland, has been arranged for Friday afternoons, beginning April 30, at Ye Liberty Playhouse; subjects: Berlin, Paris and Fez. Course tickets, $1.00, $1.50 and $2.00, may be obtained at the box office of Ye Liberty.

"Salomy Jane" at Ye Liberty

"Bob" Evans talks on the cruise of the fleet at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland next Monday evening. On the following night the Orpheus Club of Oakland give their first concert of this eason. In consequence of these two special attractions, the regular Liberty offering for next week, "Salomy Jane," will not be given until Wednesday evening, but it is announced for all the remainder of the week, with the regular Saturday and Sunday matinees. "Salomy Jane" is a play based upon the writings of Bret Harte, and particularly on the story of the same name. Paul Armstrong, the author, has woven such a sturdy dramatic structure that it holds the audience from the rise of the curtain to the very end. Many of the famous Bret Harte characters, such as Yuba Bill, the genial stage driver, Jack Murray, the cold, gentlemanly gambler, Colonel Starbottle, the fiery, duelling old Southerner, Red Pete, the poor unfortunate criminal mountaineer, run through the piece with important work to do, and to see them strutting the boards is to breathe again the atmosphere of the Harte country.

In the Limelight

It has been definately decided that Mrs. Fiske and her company from the Manhattan Theatre, New York, will open at the Valencia Theatre in her wonderful success, "Salvation Nell," for the two weeks beginning Monday evening, June 21st.

Madame Nazimova will produce "A Doll's House" during the entire first week of her engagement at the Van Ness Theatre. The repertoire for the second week will include "Hedda Gabler" and "Comtesse Coquette."

Preparations are going on apace for the summer season of Minstrelsy and Musical Comedy to be inaugurated at the American Theatre Sunday afternoon, April 25th. I. P. Wilkerson's Minstrels of Today and Musical Comedy Company, as the organization is to be known, is rehearsing day and night and an entertainment is promised that will make amusement loving San Francisco sit up and take notice.

San Francisco theatregoers are delighted with the announcement that George Osbourne, than whom this city never knew a more popular actor, has signed for a season with the Valencia Stock Company and will make his reappearance in the city of his adoption as King Louis, in the coming production of "If I Were King."

MISCHA ELMAN

The Violinist to appear at the Garrick Theatre.

Auto Notes

Roads down the valley to the Raisin City were found to be in excellent condition last week by Frank B. Dickson, Jr., of the Studebaker Bros.' Company. Dickson says that persons who are contemplating attending the Raisin Day fete at Fresno and who have automobiles may add considerably to the pleasure of the event by driving down in their cars.

Perhaps no better tribute to the standing of this city as an automobile center could be paid it than the frequent visits made here by the highest officials of the most important eastern factories. The latest to signify their intention of looking over the field are Edward L. Thomas, Vice-President of the E. R. Thomas Motor Company, and Lee Counselman, general sales manager of the Chalmers-Detroit Motor Company. These officials will arrive here near the end of this week.

Mr. A. O. Harwood, superintendent of the San Francisco office of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, took delivery of one of the new 40 horsepower Buicks from the Howard Automobile Company on Saturday. Mr. Harwood proved an adept at driving an automobile, and after an hour's instruction took hold of the wheel on Sunday and drove the car round the bay. As this was Mr. Harwood's first attempt at driving an automobile, he thinks he is justified in feeling rather proud of his ability as a driver with such short instructions.

E. L. Cox of Madera christened his new sixty horsepower Thomas Flyer by a trip into the Muir Woods last Sunday. The roads into the park have dried out, but the process has left them in a dangerously rutty condition. The ease with which his new car took the rough roads has tempted Mr. Cox to make a more exacting tour, and he is now preparing to start for Portland which trip will give him an opportunity to test his Thomas over the worst roads on this coast.

The Chalmers-Detroit Company will have three cars in the Glidden Tour. This many are promised to President Lane of the Detroit Auto Dealers' Association, at the time the question of the number of cars Detroit would enter, first came up. The Glidden Tour Committee asked for a guarantee of a certain number of cars, before it would consider having the start made from Detroit. The Chalmers-Detroit entries have now been formally made, including the payment of entrance fees.

Prospective automobile owners are given some good advice which will aid them considerably in the selection of a car, by Chester N. Weaver, one of the most enthusastic motorists on the Pacific Coast, and incidentally, manager of the San Francisco branch of the Studebaker Bros.' Company of California. Weaver's remarks point out the fallacy of selecting a car purely because it may be equipped with some particular feature, which in many instances has served only one purpose, namely, gaining notoriety, not necessarily of the advantageous kind. Weaver's remarks follow: "In the final selection of a car a prospective owner should always take into account the balance between its usable powers, its control, its qualities of traction, its adaptability to roads of all descriptions, its past service and the actual evidence the car has given of its own durability. All of these must precede the appeal the car makes to the esthetic

One of the latest purchasers of a Chalmers-Detroit "40" is C. E. Mathewson of the Diamond Rubber Company. Mr. Mathewson bought the car on the advice of his brother, Lin Mathewson, the celebrated racing driver, who holds the world's track record for fifty miles. A short time ago Mathewson visited all the prominent factories of the east in search of a car that would suit coast conditions. Even with his long and varied experience in the automobile industry, among the host of good cars turned out this year Mathewson was at a loss to choose until he struck the Chalmers-Detroit factory. He was immediately impressed with the speed and durability of the Chalmers-Detroit "40" and he hardly needed the advice of his brother to induce him to select the forty horsepower model of this car for his use in this city. Mr. Mathewson is convinced that his latest purchase is an ideal car for the usage which a machine receives in this town.

Lee Counselman, general sales manager for the Chalmers-Detroit Motor Company, left Detroit April 1st for an extended trip throughout the west. He will arrive in San Francisco about the 18th or 19th, spending a few days with the company's San Francisco agents.

While touring in his Thomas near Fresno with a party of friends, George Roeding came across one of the old time San Francisco street cars. How it got there in the middle of a big wheat field is the puzzle that has worried the traveler for years. The inside of the car still has the signs telling the passenger to "Smoke on the front platform," "Alight after the car stops" and "Deposit your fare in the box" just as they were twenty-five years ago. The car is two hundred and twenty-five miles from its native rails

QUESTION—Why do all agents compare their automobiles to the Thomas?

Our answer—We are the only ones in our native land that had faith enough in our car to run it around the world.

A BIG TIP, $3,500,000.00—If everybody used a Thomas there would be no necessity of spending $3,500,000 for good roads.

All roads are good for a Thomas. Does anybody believe the roads are paved from New York to Paris? If so, try it.

A Tale of Mystery

"The Man in Lower Ten" is hardly to be called a detective story, since the detectives, amateur and professional, cut but a poor figure in unravelling the mystery, but it is a good specimen of the criminal in fiction, the story in which both motive and the chief actor are concealed until the end. The man who engaged "Lower Ten" was a lawyer occupied in prosecuting a case of forgery. It became necessary for him to convey the forged notes from Washington to Pittsburg in order to have them repudiated, and the deposition made by the multimillionaire witness who was too ill to attend the trial. There was reason to believe that an attempt to steal them would be made and precautions were taken accordingly. When he was ready to retire Blakeley found his berth occupied by another sleeper and the porter suggested that instead of disturbing the occupant Blakeley should take another unoccupied section. Before morning he left his berth long enough to smoke a cigarette in the vestibule and at rising time he made the disagreeable discovery that not only his precious satchel but every article of his clothing of which he had divested himself had disappeared. While claiming the attention of porter and conductor another discovery was made—that the occupant of Lower Ten had been murdered some time during the night or early morning. Blakeley's story of the robbery was given little credence, since another suit of clothing was left which fitted him well enough to have been made for him and an investigation led to the discovery of the unknown dead man's wallet in the satchel left in his possession, and to other circumstances equally suspicious, he was accused by the fellow passengers of being the murderer. The train had been running in two sections and probably owing to the excitement of the murder and robbery precautions had been neglected and there was a train wreck and a holocaust in which all the occupants of the ill-fated sleeper save four lost their lives and much of the circumstantial evidence was destroyed. While, of course, the known facts told most heavily against Blakeley, readers who view events from his standpoint know he was as much a victim as the man who was killed, but they soon find themselves balancing the probabilities of two other hypothesis, and in due course of time discover that they have been on the wrong scent from the first, but meanwhile there are a mysterious occupant or visitor to an unoccupied house which overlooks Blakely's premises, a game of hide and seek with a detective who does not enjoy the sport, a startling revelation at a moving picture show, and a couple more tragedies before the denouement is made. And of course there is a love story—their always is. "The Man in Lower Ten" is a rather gruesome tale on the whole. What little of the lighter vein there is one can hardly call it comedy in this connection—is supplied by Mrs. Klopton, Blakeley's lugubrious housekeeper and Hotchkiss, the amateur detective, with his efforts to apply Dupin and Sherlock Holmes' methods to the unraveling of the mystery. Bobbs, Merrill Co. are the publishers.

Some Good Short Stories

Time and again we are reminded that our country has produced no Kipling to sing the praises of the American soldier and immortalize the types, and yet for the past ten years there have been appearing single narratives and groups of tales varing in quality from good to excellent, which but for the rapidity in which one volume succeeds another, would challenge and hold attention. Kipling may be the commander in chief but his subordinates and the high privates in the ranks of his followers are a worthy host to lead. The latest volume to be added to the list of fiction or embroidered facts pertaining to our Colonial possessions is Rowland Thomas's "The Little Gods"—the little gods that laugh at men and their endeavors. Eleven stories, independent, but strung together on a slender wire of dreaming reminiscence. The first chapter, or rather the first story, is "Fagan," the $5000 prize winner in the Collier competition of a few years ago. It is reported that the author himself regarded "Fagan" lightly and pinned his hopes on another story. If his second choice is included in this collection it is more probable than not that many readers would agree with him for "Fagan" is neither the most powerful nor the best told of the short dozen. For the most part the stories are tragic enough, and death is by no means the worst tragedy, but "A Little Ripple of Patriotism" and "The Superfalous Man" are such lightsome diversions as would have pleased Mulvaney and Ortheris and if one has lingering thoughts of "a brutal and licentuous soldiery" one needs but turn to "An Optimist" or "The Little Man" to remember that such outbreaks come seldom and far between, in the stern business of war and conquest. There are tales of civilans as well as of soldiers. "Where there is no turning" has been told and will be told again as long as there are superior and inferior races—the tragedy of debased blood and the awakening when it is too late. "This Fortune" shows waste of another kind—waste of good abilities, native energy and capacity put to base usage, and "McGennis Promotion" is almost opposite for McGennis, deputy supervisor, capable, energetic, though uncertificated, wearied to death of the monotony of his toil, promoted at last, discovers that he is too much "in love with his job" to leave his district. The pride of doing a good thing well is after all more near to his heart than recognition and big pay. Some few of these stories have been reprinted from the magazines. Those who have read them once will be glad to come upon them again for they are worth while. Published by Little, Brown & Co., Boston.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Amateur Hawkshaw—Your theory respecting the purpose that animated the Sunday night raid in Calhoun's office is not implausible. Indeed the theory is neither novel nor held exclusively by yourself. In the Sunday morning papers it was reported that Calhoun would return to town that day. Now it is hardly reasonable to suppose that the gumshoe men expected the men connected with the defense to put telltale papers in their safes after they had notice that a search warrant had been issued. It is as you suggest more reasonable to suppose that with Calhoun back in town a raid on his private safe would be met with resistance. What would be done in that event we can only surmise. Of course it was fortunate that Calhoun did not lose his temper. The provocation was great, but how agreeable to certain people the result would have been had he resisted! Some day perhaps the whole truth will come out.

Taxpayer—(1) It all depends on whether you don't mind having yourself branded as a crook. Unless you are in favor of municipal ownership of everything that is now owned by a public service corporation you must expect to be characterized as something infamous. (2) No, we do not think that our public officials have the ability to operate any public utility to the advantage of taxpayers. We regard them as the worst lot of Mutts that ever came down the pike.

Miss Culture—Yes, Mr. Hubbard is a man of genius. He has the genius to persuade the illiterate that he is a new force in literature and to make the platitudes of Samuel Smiles as impressive as the Sermon on the Mount. His standing in the world of philosophy compares favorably with that of Ella Wheeler Wilcox in the realm of poesy.

AUTO-SUGGESTION

"What happened?"

"Nothing, only I got so fat it worried me."

Teller—Oh, it's all right so far as it goes.

Hail to the Healthful Raisin!

It has been decreed that on April 30th we shall all eat raisins. Two unanswerable reasons are offered for eating raisins on that day and on other days after the habit has been acquired: Raisins are healthful, and they are the product of one of California's most important industries. Therefore let us eat raisins for health and thereby kill the other bird with the same stone. Raisins contain carbohydrates, which is the scientic name for sugars; protein, which is a nitrogenous substance supposed to form the basis of albumen, which is the nutritive element upon which young plants feed; fiber, fat, water and ash. One pound of seeded raisins, it is declared by those who are in the business of raising raisins, represents a food value equal to six pounds of apples, five pounds of bananas, one and one-fifth pounds of potatoes, one pound of bread, two pounds of milk, one and one-fourth pounds of boneless fish, seven-eighths pounds of eggs, and three-fifths pounds of beef. It is an excellent showing for the raisin. Therefore let us acquire the raisin habit that good digestion may wait on appetite and health on both. Let the hitherto infrequent raisin become the fashion in all things cookable; let us feed raisins to our children when they cry for gum and caramels; let us eat raisins at the theatre instead of bon-bons and glace fruits; let us chew raisins instead of cloves when we go out between the acts; let us put away the pink pill and the cough lozenge and the musky tablet of pharmaceutical commerce and ask our druggist for medicated raisins; let us, in short, cease to regard the raisin as a luxury and make of it a necessity. The bakers are threatening to raise the price of bread and to serve us with smaller loaves; the food analysts tell us that a pound of seeded raisins has a food value equal to that of a pound of bread; the conclusion is obvious as well as logical; let us eat pounds of raisins instead of pounds of bread. We may even revise the familiar quatrain of old Omar's Rubaiyat to read:

> "Here with a box of raisins beneath the Bough
> A Flask of Red, a Book of Verse—and Thou
> Beside me singing in the Wilderness—
> Oh, Wilderness were Paradise enow!"

Suggestions for Other "Days"

And when we have firmly established "raisin day," when we have put the raisin growers of California permanently on a basis of perennial prosperity, let us perform the same service for all the other fruit industries of the State. Let us have an "apple day," an "orange day," a "prune day," an "apricot day," a "cherry day," a "walnut day," a "peach day," and so on through the long list of deciduous and citrus products of our climate-favored, flower-spangled, milk-and-honey-flowing land. We might even set aside a "dried-apple day" or a "raspberry-jam day," or a "preserved-pear day." Let us have a "day" for every thing that grows within our borders, and let us have something for every day in the year—something that we will eat exclusive of all other things. That's the way to make our fruit-growing industries profitable; and if we can spread the gospel of a California fruit diet abroad throughout the world as the raisin men are doing, even the Japanese who are steadily monopolizing this industry will reap a larger profit, and at the same time cease to be a "formidable competitor" against the white man.

Our Mad Financial Pace

We are glad to see our esteemed contemporaries, the Chronicle and Examiner, take heed of the suggestion with reference to the advisability of curbing the prodigality of our public servants which was offered with meticulous deference to superior wisdom in the columns of this vigilant journal of comment. Less than a month ago when the young Napoleons of finance who are managing our municipal affairs threw away a small fortune on a worthless garbage franchise, the Chronicle and the Examiner were in a most amiable and a most complaisant mood. No note of protest did either of them sound. Indeed, at that time they appeared to have unlimited confidence in the financial genius of our spendthrift administration. It seemed as though they regarded municipal bonds as a kind of magic paper of clairvoyant origin, possessing an inexhaustible energy on the radium principle. So many were the projected improvements which met with their approval that we took occasion to warn them that the city was in danger of being taxed into bankruptcy. Now comes the awakened Chronicle, observing with reference to the building of a municipal street railroad that "The city is rapidly incurring a debt which, before we get through with it, is likely to plunge a once debt-free city in debt to the limit of our borrowing capacity." Furthermore: "If our people do not wish to be driven out of their homes by taxation they will go slow in issuing bonds for anything which they can get by the use of private capital." Now the Examiner, crazy as ever to experiment in municipal street railroads, protests against purchasing property for a civic centre because "civic centres cost money." The Examiner has awakened, too, and it asks: "Where is this money to come from?"—the money for the civic centre, not for the municipal road, the Hearst hobby, which must be built even though we should have to go hungry to build it. It is amusing to ponder the differences of opinion and the diverting inconsistencies of our two esteemed contemporaries. The Chronicle thinks it would be awful to go to the limit of our borrowing capacity; the Examiner is appalled only at the prospect of overrunning our borrowing capacity before building the street railroad. The Chronicle is opposed to issuing bonds for anything that we can get by the use of private capital, and yet, in the same breath this economist suggests that it might be well for the city to embark in the real estate business for the purpose of acquiring, subdividing and selling the Lake Merced lands. The Chronicle has not entirely lost confidence in the commercial ability of our public servants; as to the Examiner, it has confidence only in their talent for operating street railroads.

The Beale Idea

Mr. Truxton Beale, a dilettante of political science, has been advising the people of Bakersfield to establish a County Parliament "which," we are told, "need have no legal organization, but which would yet become a power for good in the community and the means of crystallizing and giving direction to public sentiment." Mr. Beale has unbounded faith in the efficacy of pure democracy. When all the people get together and do their own thinking and act on their own convictions, wisdom and virtue flow automatically. This is Mr. Beale's political article of faith. Lecturing the Bakersfieldians he told them of Switzerland "the land of immemorial freedom" where it has been demonstrated through the ages that a pure democracy may be both vigorous and enduring. According to Mr. Beale the cantons of Switzerland have been governed since the days of Charles of Burgundy by popular assemblies. We have heard something like this before. We have also heard it denied. John Adams, once upon a time President of the United States, a statesman who had something to do with the fashioning of this government and who was better satisfied with its institutions than Mr. Beale appears to be, conducted a personal investigation of the venerable canton governments of Switzerland and reported that their machinery was far more complicated than the machinery of this republic. Mr. Adams made some interesting discoveries in Switzerland. He found, for example, that the Canton of Appenzel, consisting of a series of valleys scattered among inaccessible rocks, populated by not more than 50,000 souls, a simple people engaged in simple pursuits, having hardly any commerce with the world, were unable to agree in the management of their affairs. They divided the Canton into two portions and these were governed by a chief magistrate, two councils and two popular assemblies. Not exactly a pure democracy, even Mr. Beale will admit. Living by agriculture, in primitive simplicity, it would seem that these people ought to be able to live without any government and yet we find, as Mr. Adams said, that they were almost plunged into a civil war and that they settled down under a combination of the monarchic, the aristocratic and democratic forms of government. In the Canton of Underwald, only twenty-five miles in length and seventeen in breadth, the people divided into two sections, and though the government is called a democracy, there is a general assembly under the restraint of a popular assembly composed of fifty-eight senators, a general council formed of all the officers of administration, besides, for justice and police, a chamber of seven and a chamber of sixty-five. So it was, Adams tells us, in the Cantons of Gloris and Zug and even in Uri where William Tell was born—mixed forms of government miscalled democracies. The fact is in Switzerland as well as in ancient Greece, to which Mr. Beale has made reference, the so-called pure democracies were governments by representation. Now a simple democracy by representation is a contradiction in terms. It is true that in Athens there was for a time a government in which popular will had great latitude. The people in assembly heard their affairs discussed by their orators, and they voted on the spur of the moment; the vote of the majority became a decree. It was at this time that the memorable meeting was held to deliberate on the fate of the rebels of Mitylene. Under the influence of an harangue by Cleon, the Jimmy Phelan of his day, the people by a large majority voted that the whole male population, to the number of 6,000, should be put to the sword and that all the women and children should be sold into slavery. A galley was at once despatched to Mitylene to order the decree to be executed. The night passed and in the morning the people were filled with horror and remorse at the orders they had given. A fresh assembly was called, and the decree of the previous day was rescinded. Twenty-four hours after the first galley had started. A second galley followed it and the unflagging chase that ensued, the strenuous efforts of the rowers and the arrival of the reprieve at the moment when the people were about to be put to death, are the thrilling elements of one of the most dramatic episodes in all the history of Thucydides. Boundless was the popular energy of Athens when exerted through the County Parliament which Mr. Beale has taken for his model, but directed by a Pericles, who was perhaps as learned a scholar as Mr. Beale himself, it revealed glimpses of passion, vacillation and distraction in a people given over to the variable winds of opinion; a people that decreed hemlock for a man one day and a statue to his memory the next; a people of the highest civilization, and yet a people whose history makes it easy to understand why democracy failed to withstand the solid concentration of the Macedonian phalanx. We are not disposed, as has probably been inferred, to felicitate the Bakersfieldians on the Beale idea. We believe that even a few crooked Supervisors can do them less harm than timid public servants suggestionized by a County Parliament responsive to the seductive eloquence of a Cleon. For of course we cannot conceive of their having the eternal guidance of so distinguished a patriot as Mr. Truxtun Beale.

The Emancipation Propaganda

Mrs. Clarence Mackay has gone over to England to lend prestige and give impetus to the cause of the Suffragettes. We are told that Mrs. Mackay is a brilliant woman and that "she will bring powerful arguments to bear in support of equal rights, arguments that will open the eyes of British statesmen, for Mrs. Mackay has given deep study to the subject of the enfranchisement of women." Mrs. Mackay is doubtless all that her admirer asserts. Nevertheless she is not likely to open the eyes of British statesmen with arguments novel or singularly cogent. The agitation conducted by the Suffragettes of England is not of recent origin. English women have been protesting for more than half a century against an assumption by man of a superiority which he persistently declines to submit to the ordinary tests of truth, and the matter has been so frequently and so thoroughly discussed that there is hardly anything new to be said on the subject. British statesmen are familiar with all aspects of the question. The stereotyped objections to equal suffrage have been answered over and over again. So distinguished a philosopher as J. S. Mill answered most of them on the floor of the House of Commons. Mill was an enthusiastic proponent of equal rights. He declared that he knew of no reasonable ground for excluding an entire half of the nation not only from actual admission but from the very possibility of being admitted within the pale of citizenship. In those days as now, the opponents of equal suffrage argued that nature had drawn a broad line of distinction between the two sexes and chalked out the career of force and stability of intellect for men and the career of amiability, tenderness and grace for women. In answer to this it was said that the same theory was advanced when the bold idea was conceived of teaching women to read. Men were shocked at the thought of woman forsaking the spindle and frying-pan, her own peculiar science, to plunge into the unfeminine mysteries of the alphabet. The fact is that with every fresh installment of liberty and independence granted to women by advancing civilization, every step forward from her primitive condition of slavery to her present position of legal subjection, she has become more attractive to men by reason of her graces, and the masculine ideal has rather improved than deteriorated. We must confess that we know of no objection that has ever been urged against equal suffrage that has been answered. The depths of logic have been sounded by intellectual women in the fight for emancipation. Fifty years ago they were told that the majority of women did not want the franchise. They answered that this argument is in spirit the same as that by which slaveholders have always justified slavery, and added, "We do not hold that the negro's ignorance of the moral evils of his position was an argument for keeping him in it. Thus has the discussion gone on for years; women urging a principle, men stumbling at details, or answering with ridicule; women asking for justice, men offering privileges; women advancing reasons, men answering with their own feelings and instincts. But all the while the Suffragette movement is gathering force. Inclined though we have been to deride it, we know that reason and justice ultimately prevail, and we are therefore convinced that the enfranchisement of women is only a matter of time.

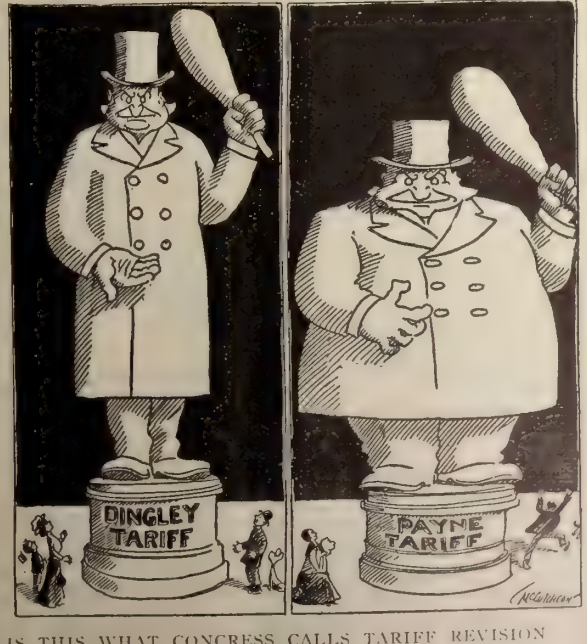
Perspective Impressions

The Globe appears to have its noisome evening contemporary in distress. And yet the Bulletin had choice of weapons.

The discovery that Benjamin Ide Wheeler and Gumshoe Burns are on terms of social intimacy should occasion no surprise.

The capture of a bearded fish is reported from Catalina Island—a marine fuzzy-wuzzy who probably came up for a barber.

Lincoln Steffens solemnly asserts that he has been suppressing news because it is incredible. But what can be more incredible than this characteristic steffenism?



Of course, says the Bulletin, there are some persons who really believe that malefactors of great wealth can be sent to the penitentiary in California. Walter J. Barnett, friend and associate of the Powers that Be, is not one of them.

The old familiar question, "Why don't the people go to church?" is going the rounds. Questions that are far more engaging to us are: Why do certain persons go to church? and Why doesn't the church ever fall on them?

France is said to be on the eve of another revolution. Wouldn't it be funny if, as a result of government ownership, which is really what ails France at present, the monarchists should return to power?

Professor William Pickering of Harvard says that for ten million dollars he can flash messages to Mars. But suppose the Martians should disdain to take notice of them. From all accounts they are a very old people. They may be inclined to regard us as climbers.

The New York Sun says that the direct primary in South Carolina has lowered the standard of candidates. The experience of South Carolina has added nothing to human knowledge. It has merely given emphasis to an axiom of the science of government. Demos is always true to form.

The Laureates of England

By Arthur Swan

At the death of Lord Tennyson it was the consensus of opinion in the literary world that merit entitled Algernon Charles Swinburne to the office of Poet Laureate, but early-Victorian prejudice was not to be set aside even at the end of the century, and as a consequence mediocrity was exalted above genius. Swinburne is dead, but his poetry lives and much of it is instinct with life everlasting. Austin lives, but his poetry is already forgotten. It is not singular, however, as many believe, that a man of Austin's inferior ability should have been appointed Poet Laureate at a time when a man of Swinburne's genius was available. The selection of the poet king has not always been a wise one. With few exceptions, as a matter of fact, the laureates have been inferior to some of their contemporaries. Furthermore the laurels have been conferred on poets far inferior to Austin. The reigning laureate, though a feeble versifier, has written some pretty good poetry. Several charming sonnets have come from his pen and he has written two or three powerful dramatic poems. Nevertheless it must be admitted that amid the vacant chaff well meant for grain the occasional morsels of poetic corn are somewhat hard to find. And yet compare Austin with some of his predecessors and you will find that singers far less worthy of the laurels have worn them. You need go no farther back than the days of Colley Cibber, the comedian who is immortalized in the Dunciad. Cibber was laureate from 1730 to 1757. The best thing that Cibber ever wrote was an apology for his own life. He was a theatrical manager, a playwright and an actor.

Satires, epigrams and lampoons have at all times been plentifully written upon the laureates, but Cibber inspired more than all the others put together. Immediately after his appointment all London was laughing over these lines:

> In merry England it once was a rule,
> The King had his poet and also his fool;
> But now we're so frugal, I'd have you to know it,
> That Cibber can serve both for fool and for poet.

Laurence Eusden preceded Cibber in the office of Laureate. Gray said of him that "he was a person of great hopes in his youth, though at last he turned out a drunken parson." In Queen Anne's reign Nahum Tate was the Laureate. Pope summed up his talents in these lines:

> And he, whose fustian's so sublimely bad
> It is not poetry, but prose run mad.

Thomas Shadwell was another of the lesser lights that poured adulation on the King to earn the butt of canary wine from the royal cellar. Shadwell has been immortalized in Dryden's MacFlecknoe. He was a successful dramatist but not much of a poet. For a time on friendly terms with Dryden who preceded him in the office of Laureate, he assailed that mordant satirist because of the latter's religious and political apostasy. He wrote:

> Now farewell wretched, mercenary Bayes,
> Who the King libelled and did Cromwell praise;
> Farewell, abandoned rascal, only fit
> To be abused by thy own scurrilous wit.

Dryden, who had been deposed from the office of laureate at the time of the Revolution of 1689, replied with his MacFlecknoe in which he satirized Shadwell under the name of an obscure Irish poet. He presented MacFlecknoe as the king of nonsense on his death bed thus:

> "And pondering which of all his sons was fit
> To reign and wage immortal war with wit, > Cried 'Tis resolved, for Nature pleads that he > Should only rule who most resembles me.
> Shadwell alone my perfect image bears,
> Mature in dulness from his tender years,
> Shadwell alone of all my sons is he
> Who stands confirmed in full stupidity.
> The rest to some faint meaning make pretense,
> But Shadwell never deviates into sense.'"

Dryden was not yet sufficiently revenged. A month later he published his Absalom and Achitophel in which he devoted thirty lines to Shadwell in the role of Og:

> Og, from a treason tavern rolling home
> Round as a globe and liquored every chink,
> Goodly and great he sails behind his link.
> With all this bulk there's nothing lost in Og,
> For every inch that is not fool is rogue;
> When wine has given him courage to blaspheme,
> He curses God, but God before cursed him.
> * * * * * *
> The midwife laid her hand on his thick skull
> With this prophetic blessing—"Be thou dull!
> Drink, swear and roar, forbear no lewd delight
> Fit for thy bulk, do anything but write."

The most distinguished of the Laureates that wore their laurels gracefully was "Rare Ben" Jonson, but even he was scarcely the equal of at least one of his contemporaries, for he lived in Shakespeare's day. Of his works we hear very little nowadays, for they are classics which means that they are seldom read. There is one exception, a song, with which we are all familiar, though perhaps not all of us are aware that it was written by Jonson. I refer to the song of which this is the opening stanza:

> Drink to me only with thine eyes,
> And I will pledge with mine;
> Or leave a kiss but in the cup,
> And I'll not look for wine.
> The thirst that from the soul doth rise,
> Doth ask a drink divine:
> But might I of Jove's nectar sup,
> I would not change for thine.

In recent years the laureateship has been in pretty good hands though upon this all critics are not agreed. Byron dissented in Southey's day when he wrote:

> "You, Bob! are rather insolent, you know,
> At being disappointed in your wish
> To supersede all warblers here below,
> And be the only blackbird in the dish;
> And then you overstrain yourself or so,
> And tumble downwards like the flying fish
> Gasping on deck, because you soar too high, Bob!
> And fall, for lack of moisture, quite a dry, Bob!"

Byron also had a poor opinion of Wordsworth who succeeded Southey as we learn from the following:

> The simple Wordsworth framer of a lay
> As soft as evening in his favorite May,
> Who warns his friend "to shake off toil and trouble,
> And quit his books, for fear of growing double;
> Who, both by precept and example shows
> That prose is verse, and verse is merely prose;
> Convincing all by demonstration plain,
> Poetic souls delight in prose inane."

Not even Tennyson escaped the lash of the satirist. Sir Edward Lord Lytton dubbed him "Miss Alfred" in "The New Timon" and abused him in these lines:

> "Not mine, not mine, (O muse forbid) the boon
> Of borrowed notes, the mock-birds modish tune,
> The jingling melody of purloined conceits,
> Out-babying Wordsworth and out-glittering Keats;
> Where all the airs of patchwork pastoral chime
> To drown the ears in Tennysonian rhyme!"

Tennyson promptly replied to this attack in the columns of Punch. In biting verse he ridiculed unsparingly the personal fopperies of Lytton. He proved himself better than a raw hand in the art of personal abuse as may be seen from these stanzas:

What profits now to understand
The merits of a spotless shirt—
A dapper boot—a little hand—
If half the little soul in dirt?

You talk of tinsel! Why we see
The old mask of rouge upon your cheeks.
You prate of Nature! You are he
That spilt his life about the cliques.

A Timon you! Nay, nay for shame;
It looks too arrogant a jest—
The fierce old man—to take his name
You bandbox. Off, and let him rest.

Another "municipal crib," and "right in our midst," too! What do you think of that? Perhaps you don't known what a "municipal crib" is. Well, I'm not going to tell you in plain terms what it is; if you can't guess from my "veiled allusion" what is under the veil, your curiosity will have to go unsatisfied.

That was a happy thought of mine—that "veiled allusion" reference. It conjures in the memory of the readers of "Lallah Rookh" the ghastly phantom of the Veiled Prophet of Khorassan. No man knows what was beneath that veil; but it is generally conceded that it was something very loathsome; something frightful and revolting; something that should have been veiled with a shroud—a death's-head, perhaps, covered with dying flesh upon which fed the never-dying worm.

A "municipal crib" is something like that in a moral sense—something putrid and putrescent. A "municipal crib" is a whited sepulchre in which festers woman's shame and all human depravity, male and female after their unclean kind. That's as far as I dare go in my definition without utterly shocking and disgusting my readers. Furthermore, it was not my intention to describe this "municipal crib" nor to discourse upon its ill fame. It is my purpose to call the attention of decent citizens of San Francisco to the fact that this sort of thing has been proposed in this city and that apparently it was guaranteed the "protection" of somebody amply able to give that "protection."

Luckily this foul enterprise has been nipped in the bud. A newspaper has exposed the vile scheme and the manager of the newspaper is now under arrest upon a charge of criminal libel preferred by one Tom Magee who was named as a partner of one Pincus. Magee, however, was not wholly satisfied with the redress which the law gives him in the event of proving that he has been libelled. So he gathered a gang largely composed of thugs and spies from William J. Burns' department of the District Attorney's office, and after Judge Deasy who was promoted from the District Attorney's office to be police judge, had granted a continuance of the case, Magee set upon the newspaperman and attempted to "do him up" after the manner of thugs and other brutal folk who live in the tenderloin and frequent places variously known as "The House of Blazes," "Hell's Kitchen" and "The Bucket of Blood."

"Among those present," as the bavardes of the press used to say in their "social gossip," was Charles Oliver, a bankrupt saloon-keeper, "bawled out" in open court by one of the jurors summoned on a venire in the Calhoun case as debtor to a tombstone sculptor in the amount of $20 balance due on his wife's memorial monument, which the gravestone merchant declared had been owing for seventeen years. This Charles Oliver is one of the so-called "Burns men," said to be Burns' first lieutenant in charge of the spies that come not singly but in battalions.

What interest did these "Burns men" have in this case? Were they ordered to attend the session of Judge Deasy's court and to give their "moral support" to Magee, reputed half-owner of the "municipal crib?" It was but natural that Magee's brother who is a lawyer should be there not only as an attorney to sustain his kinsman's legal contention but also to manifest his brotherly affection. It must not be written that Lawyer Magee was in court as the representative of the District Attorney, or that he was there at the behest of Special Agent Burns. It is also forbidden to inquire why all these things are done on warrants issued out of the court wherein Judge Deasy, late Assistant District Attorney, now presides. Who knows what might happen if it should be even hinted in the darkness of a "veiled allusion" that Judge Deasy is as much a part of the District Attorney's office now as he was before he was lifted to the police bench? Let us not forget that Judge Deasy is a sort of Jupiter armed with thunderbolts in the form of "blanket search warrants" and complaints for criminal libel.

Take it all together it is a very mysterious affair. It is related that Pincus, accused of partnership in the "municipal crib" with Tom Magee, was called before Chief of Police Cook and warned that he could not operate his "crib." And it is further related that Pincus laughed in the face of the Chief and told him that he would "run the place" in spite of the police. I am now waiting to see what is going to happen to Chief of Police Cook; I look for his dismissal within a short period of time. Pincus must feel almost as much incensed against Chief Cook as he does against the newspaper that exposed his "crib." Pincus will certainly invoke the wrath of his "protectors" against the Chief of Police; and what high power is there to save the Chief if these "protectors" take it into their heads to fire Cook? Nothing short of a miracle can save Cook; unless, perchance, these "higher ups" refrain from their purpose through fear of disclosing their identity. It is possible that they do not think a mere Pincus sufficiently important in their sorry scheme of things to warrant their interference on his behalf or worth the risk to themselves of avenging him.

But Pincus may procure a warrant from Judge Deasy and hale the newspaperman before the Cadi on a charge of criminal libel. I wonder that he has not done so already. Then when the newspaperman comes out of the court Pincus can slug him a la Magee—and perhaps he can induce Charles Oliver and other Burns men to be there to see fair play. There's nothing like having a pull at court.

In the meantime, what do the decent citizens of San Francisco think of it? Of course they will rejoice that the "municipal crib" was squelched in the making; but what do they think of the conditions that render a "municipal crib" possible in a city so saturated with the spirit of "reform," so beleagued with justice and good government; so filled with the divine essence of sublimated Bokeism; so thoroughly impregnated with the virus of civic purity; so far gone in the throes of a "moral uplift?"

My First Romance

(From the French of Paul de Kock)

It was in the days of the Revolution when lives were sworn away by the malicious, the envious, the revengeful; all France was ruled by the savage spirit that resides in mankind and which it is always dangerous to indulge with power.

There lived at Passy Monsieur and Madame de———. They were of the aristocracy, young and wealthy. A child had been born to them in the middle of the year 1793 some months before the happenings herein narrated. They were very happy. They took not the slightest interest in politics. It was probably their happiness that excited the envy of some terrorist. Monsieur de——— was denounced as an aristocrat and condemned to death.

On the day of the execution Madame de——— carrying her child in her arms, wandered mechanically along the Avenue des Champs Elysees and seated herself on a grassy slope within sight of the scaffold. There she sat until the people gathered and then suddenly uttering a shriek she fled the scene, holding her child with a passionate and convulsive pressure.

Returning to her deserted home she was unable to enter her room for the door had been sealed with the arms of the Republic. She passed the night in an unfurnished hall, seated on a brick pavement; the child, who was cold, wept, and the mother bent over him, sought to keep him warm and had the strength to sing him to sleep. A kind woman of the neighborhood, who came at dawn to offer her services, found her half-frozen, tearless, not daring to make a movement for fear of awakening the child who slept on her knees.

It was the end of winter, and the sun shone that day radiant and warm, one of those beautiful suns of Parisian spring which make the buds open and the lilacs bloom in a few hours. The young mother, in the little garden behind the house, had seated herself by a tub full of water to make the toilet of the infant, who was delighted at this novel process, when she was startled by a succession of heavy blows on the street door. The neighbor, who was busy at a little distance spreading out the clothes on the grass, ran to open the door and reappeared very pale.

"Oh, madame! They've come back again!"

"Who?"

"Four citizens who ask to speak to you; I knew them at once; three of them are the same who came here to get monsieur."

The men had penetrated to the garden; the good woman was not mistaken; one was the commissary of the section, accompanied by two bailiffs of the Committee of Safety, well known in Passy, which they had been terrorizing for six months. The fourth was clothed entirely in black and wore a great felt hat adorned with a bouquet of tri-colored plumes; he was a man of middle age, of a bilious tint, and with sharply marked features.

Madame recognized him immediately, although she had seen him but once. Pale with terror she murmured, in a voice that showed how near she was to fainting: "The public prosecutor—Fouquier-Tinville!"

He was already at her side.

"Citizeness?" he asked coldly.

"It is I."

"We have found, citizeness, among your husband's papers three letters signed with your name. Here they are. Do you recognize them?"

She cast a glance at the papers.

"You are going to put me in prison!" she said.

"It is a disagreeable surprise, I admit," added Fouquier in a tone of pedantic mockery, "but the law is precise. You are convicted of correspondence with the enemies of the nation."

"You are going to put me in prison?" repeated the wretched woman in terror.

"Moreover, you will not be allowed to remain here; the seals will not be broken till all is over; it is impossible to allow you to live in this house, which has become the property of the Republic." And turning to the commissary: "You will conduct the citizeness to the Conciergerie; I shall examine her this evening, and you will give her name to the clerk Fabricius. She will go tomorrow; it is useless to leave her to languish in prison."

"I must go? Tomorrow?"

"Yes, to the tribunal. You can prepare your defense between now and then."

He spoke in short tones, without inflection, without emphasis; one could perceive in him the man whose heart is of stone, whom nothing can soften, impervious to all despair, insensible to all tears; the man who made a profession of death; the faithful official who kills because he is ordered to kill, as inflexible and as pitiless as the knife, to which he loved to liken himself. Madame de ——— perceived that she was lost. With an involuntary movement she pressed against her bosom the child she held in her arms, who was joyously waving his little naked legs.

Her gaze wandered over the corner of earth where she had been so happy, as if she were calling it to witness the cruelty of men, as if she were expecting, perhaps, that some savior would rush forth to snatch her, the innocent one, from the executioners. But what folly! Who would have had sufficient courage and audacity to enter the lists against the implacable force that these men represented? What hero would not have recoiled? Yet, nevertheless, the savior was there, very near her."

"What have I done to go to the guillotine? she sighed. "What crime have I committed?"

Fouquier-Tinville, the ever calm, was about to answer, but he was prevented. The child, surprised rather than frightened at the appearance of this strange face, held out his little arms toward the terrible purveyor of the guillotine and gave vent to a burst of baby laughter, delicious expression of mysterious joys of which God only knows the secret.

The mother trembled; she tried to quiet him; she feared that his gaiety might offend these dark men. But the baby wriggled with delight, and, still laughing and showing his rosy gums, he held out his hands toward the enticing colored plumes that waved on the felt hat of the public prosecutor.

"Is that your child, citizeness?"

"Yes, citizen."

"He is the son of ———?"

The mother, stifled by sobs, made an affirmative sign with her head. "His father died yesterday," she added with a trembling voice.

Fouquier-Tinville was silent a moment, then he resumed:

"How old is he?"

"Ten months."

"He is big for his age. Where is his nurse?"

"It is I who nurse him, citizen."

"Ah, it is you who—"

He seemed to make an effort, and bit his lip. The

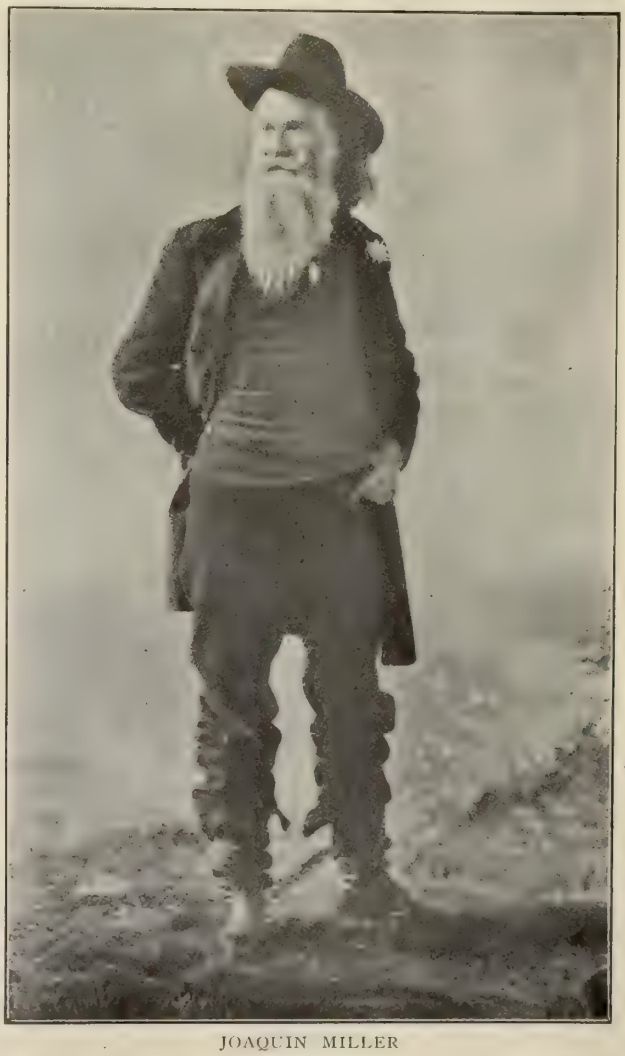
The Grilling of Wright



Among the comic tragedies of life is that which befalls a newspaper when it entirely misses the point of a story which it has related with manifest zeal for the unimportant details. The Examiner figured in this sort of tragedy when it spread before its readers the story of the sad experience of Senator Leroy Wright of San Diego who was grilled by the Call for doing a favor for Mr. John D. Spreckels. This was a good story even though incomplete. The very incompleteness of it is a story in itself; for before the Examiner gave publicity to the amusing outcome of Senator Wright's act of kindness the joke was on those immediately concerned, but now the joke is also on the Examiner. The point of the main story is not that Wright was grilled by the Spreckels paper for doing the Spreckels bidding but that the Call, one of the most vociferous of our moral agents, publicly recanted its sincere criticism of Wright and sought to justify the recantation by pretending to have discovered that it had done the statesman injustice. This is the point that was not exploited by the Examiner.

The Viciousness of It

On March 23rd the Call discussed what it was pleased in its righteous wrath to designate as "Senator Wright's Vicious Bill." In a leading editorial this zealous guardian of the people's interests pronounced Senator Wright's bill "the most vicious attack on municipal home rule that has emanated from a body that has been unusually prolific in such corrupt measures." We were told on March 23rd that the object of the bill was to make public property that is worth millions of dollars "a matter of corrupt bargain and sale for the profit of men burdened with no sense of responsibility"; that the bill should properly be entitled "An invitation to commit robbery on an unexampled scale"; that it facilitated bribery; that "its purpose is wholly corrupt and a disgrace to its proponents." In this language there is implied no suggestion of the possibility of inaccurate judgment. It is forceful and emphatic; the language of a man who is cocksure of his thesis, who has investigated and knows whereof he speaks.

The Sanctum Irradiated

It is safe to assume, however, that the editor of the Call was not aware on March 23rd that one of the objects of the bill was to enable Mr. John D. Spreckels to validate his street railroad franchises in San Diego. It is safe to assume that had he known that Senator Wright introduced the bill in furtherance of Mr. Spreckels's San Diego interests he would not have regarded it as a vicious measure, for Mr. Spreckels is one of the public spirited citizens of San Diego. He is the Patrick Calhoun of that thriving country. He has contributed much to its growth and he is beloved by the people. In view of these circumstances it is not surprising that the ignorance of the Call's editor was dispelled very soon after the paper of March 23rd was delivered in San Diego. By March 27th the light had penetrated the Call's editorial sanctum. On that date the Call again discussed the Wright bill editorially. "According to the unanimous opinion of numerous competent legal authorities," the editorial began, "the Call and several of its contemporaries were in error in their vigorous adverse criticism of Senate Bill 467 introduced and passed by Senator Leroy A. Wright of San Diego." Who these "numerous competent legal authorities" are we are not permitted to know. Suffice it that "the Call hastens to make such amends as it may to a Senator who is, and always has been, held in the highest esteem by this newspaper." More of a knock than a boost, the irreverent will say, but Wright is of San Diego and is probably unconscious of the logical deduction. Anyway it is likely that his indignation was assuaged by the apology, which I suspect was written to order, a suspicion which was strengthened by the last paragraph of the about-face retraction: "In simple but further justice to Senator Wright, it should be said that neither he nor any other person has requested or suggested that the Call correct its error."

JOAQUIN MILLER

The "Poet of the Sierras" whose verse is thrilling London Theatregoers.

Joaquin Miller's Forgetfulness

Cincinnatus Heine Miller, known to literature as Joaquin Miller, "Poet of the Sierras," disappointed an audience last Sunday. He had promised, it is said, to write a poem for the Press Club entertainment and deliver it himself, and an eager audience waited in vain for his picturesque personality. It is reported that he forgot the date of the entertainment, but I am told that what he really forgot was to write the poem. The man that made the Sierras famous is no longer young. His Muse is getting somewhat jaded and is not to be invoked on every old occasion. Miller has been writing poetry since the sixties of the last century. It was in 1871 that he brought out his volume of Songs of the Sierras which drew to him the attention of the most distinguished critics of Europe, all of whom praised his work for the originality, freshness of style and vigor of thought which it exhibited. And by the way, Miller's verse is once more receiving attention in London. A popular actress has been making a hit with one of his poems, "The Battle Flag at Shenandoah," which has a great deal of the dramatic quality. The poem is so old that it is worth reproducing:

The Battle Flag at Shenandoah

The tented field wore a wrinkled frown,
And the emptied church from the hill looked down
On the emptied road and the emptied town,
That summer Sunday morning.

And here was the blue, and there was the gray;
And a wide green valley rolled away
Between where the battling armies lay,
That sacred Sunday morning.

And Custer sat, with impatient will,
His restless horse, 'mid his troopers still,
As he watched with glass from the oakset hill
That silent Sunday morning.

Then fast he began to chafe and to fret;
"There's a battle flag on a bayonet
Too close to my own true soldiers set
For peace this Sunday morning.

"Ride over, some one," he haughtily said,
"And bring it to me! Why, in bars blood red
And in stars I will stain it, and overhead
Will flaunt it this Sunday morning!"

Then a West-born lad, pale-faced and slim,
Rode out and touching his cap to him,
Swept down, swept swift as spring swallows swim,
That anxious Sunday morning.

On, on through the valley; up, up, anywhere!
That pale-faced lad like a bird through the air
Kept on till he climbed to the banner there
That bravest Sunday morning.

And he caught up the flag, and around his waist
He wound it tight, and he turned in haste,
And swift his perilous route retraced
That daring Sunday morning.

All honor and praise to the trusty steed!
Ah, boy, and banner, and all God speed!
God's pity for you in your hour of need
This deadly Sunday morning.

O deadly shot! and O shower of lead!
O iron rain on the brave bare head!
Why, even the leaves from the trees fall dead
This dreadful Sunday morning.

But he gains the oaks! Men cheer in their might!
Brave Custer is laughing in his delight!
Why, he is embracing the boy outright
This glorious Sunday morning!

But, soft! Not a word has the pale boy said.
He unwinds the flag. It is stained, striped red
With his heart's best blood; and he falls down dead
In God's still Sunday morning.

So, wrap this flag to his soldier's breast;
Into stars and stripes it is stained and blest;
And under the oaks let him rest and rest
Till God's great Sunday morning.

Not so unimportant as it might seem at first blush is the news that a law firm was completely absorbed by the present Administration. From this news we get an idea of the kind of ability that is deemed adequate for the public service. Apparently nobody knew of the existence of this law firm until it was disrupted and annihilated. Its members had achieved no distinction in the courts of the State. So little demand was there for their talents

One of them became the Mayor's Secretary and as such, it is currently reported, dictates the erratic and wonderful policy of the Administration. Unsuccessful in his chosen profession, nevertheless he has sufficient ability to run the city government. Another of the firm became a supervisor and as such it is his privilege to advise as to how the millions of our bonded debt should be disbursed. The intricacies of the business of our public service corporations he has mastered, and the most complicated of the problems growing out of their relations with the government he is prepared to solve at a moment's notice. The Revolution in Turkey

Old Abdul Hamid appears, at this writing, to have come to the end of his tether. A year ago when he made concessions to the young Turkish party it was believed that a revolution had been averted, and doubtless it would have been had it not become evident that the Sultan was intent on disrupting the revolutionary organization and regaining lost ground. The present disturbance means that he was caught at his old tricks. The young Turkish ideal may be conjectured from the name of the organization devoted to its realization. It is called the Committee of Union and Progress. The purpose of its leaders as declared at the outest was not only to band together conflicting peoples, but to raise their country to the level of front-rank powers by reorganizing the army, navy and finances and by creating facilities for developing the great natural riches of the land. They desire to put an end, once for all, to the erosion of the Ottoman Empire. At first they permitted the Sultan to save his skin by conceding the Constitution. Many people believed that his action was a spontaneous boon and accordingly they acclaimed it with the wildest enthusiasm. The original conspirators, however, knew the truth and they knew that it behooved them to keep close watch on the Sultan's household. From recent developments it is clear they discovered a movement to render negligible the advantages they had gained.

These women have crosses on their foreheads between their eyes. They were thus branded to save them from the harem. The cross inspires aversion in the Turks and averts from a woman the fate of abduction.

Blessings of Misfortune

Epochs in history are usually marked by great calamities. An ingenious historian has traced the history of civilization by the changes that were wrought from the result of fifteen decisive battles in which the victory was overwhelming and the defeat irreparable. These battles, as recorded by Creasy were Marathon; the defeat of the Athenians at Syracuse, B. C. 412; the battle of Arbella, B. C. 331; the battle of Metaurus, B. C. 207; the victory of Arminius over Varus and the Roman legions, A. D. 9; the battle of Chalons, A. D. 451; the battle of Tours, A. D. 773; the battle of Hastings, A. D. 1066; Joan of Arc's victory over the English at Orleans, A. D. 1429; the defeat of the Spanish Armada, A. D. 1588; the battle of Blenheim, A. D. 1704; and the battle of Pultowa, A. D. 1709; the victory of the Americans over Burgoyne at Saratoga, A. D. 1777; the battle of Valmy, A. D. 1792; and the battle of Waterloo, A. D. 1815. Nearly all the races of men date their origin from a period posterior to a great flood that destroyed every human being on the face of the earth. Christianity began with the crucifixion of its founder. A cause is inevitably followed by its effect; and the causes that have left their lasting effects upon history are those that have contributed most largely to the immediate distress of mankind. It may be said that beneficent results have eventually been the consequence of the most disastrous calamities, and it is the essence of optimistic philosophy that all things, however calamitous in their immediate effects have been for the best in the final summary of their consequences. Within the narrow limits of a parochial environment this view of events that have been regarded as disasters at the time of their occurrence is especially distinct. Three years ago this week San Francisco was in ruins; it had been wrenched and racked by a mighty earthquake and its habitations were in flames; thousands of citizens were homeless; other thousands had fled from the city. Naught but desolation was our portion, and the future was very uncertain for the property loss was immeasurable and most of those who had suffered were impoverished to their ultimate of money and credit. Only courage and hope are sometimes assets more valuable than money or unlimited credit; and so it has been with us. Our city is once more a metropolis, standing on a firmer foundation than ever, with a future brighter than we could have predicted "before the fire." After three years there are few traces of the ruin that was inflicted by a calamity that is historical for its extent and cost. Swiftly we have repaired an injury that some of us regarded as irreparable, and that which we have put in place of that which was is better, more substantial, more impossing, more beautiful. In our hurry we have, perhaps, neglected an opportunity to improve the topographical features of the city in accordance with the best modern ideas of civic improvement and convenience; but that is a negligence that may be materially remedied by future enterprise and civic patriotism. Our population is greater than it was before the disaster, and it is increasing rapidly. With the completion of the Panama Canal and the consequent influx of immigrants from the world's centers of population our wealth and our importance as the metropolis of California will be enhanced immeasurably. All that we lack at the present time is manufacturing enterprises upon which great populations are supported; and with every facility of electric power and cheap fuel, these must follow upon increased population. In that near future, also the commerce of the Pacific will be the dominant trade of the world, and San Francisco will be the main station on this world's highway. California at the present time has little more than two millions of population; in less than ten years there will be double that number of people within our borders. Our soil is the richest and most productive in the world; our climate is unsurpassed; our resources are illimitable. In the past we have been isolated from the world's activities; in the future we shall be the vortex of human effort. And everything will be tributary to San Francisco, as it has been tributary to the great seaport capitals. Those now living may not live to see the full fruition of this prophecy; but their children's children will date the glory and pre-eminence of the great Pacific metropolis from the disaster of 1906 and the results of that calamity.

Horny-Handed Graft

The carpenters have decided by referendum vote that after June 1st it shall be unlawful for any member of this ancient and honorable craft to accept from any employer a wage less than $5 for each day's work. As the unions have enacted that a carpenter's work day shall be eight hours, the minimum wage per hour will therefore be 62½ cents. The laborer is proverbially worthy of his hire; practically he is worthy of his hire only when he honestly earns it. A minimum wage of $5 a day or 62½ cents an hour is not too much in compensation for the hire of a competent, conscientious carpenter; but it is greatly in excess of the worth of a carpenter, for example, who botches his work and then refuses to repair the botch unless his employer will pay him $5 a day for the extra labor. Yet I understand that this is the rule of the carpenters' union in all work contracted for "by the day." I know a man that built a house and paid four carpenters $5 a day for three days' work on four windows that leaked like a sieve after the first rains of last winter. The boss carpenter was asked to mend the windows and he coolly informed the owner of the house that it would cost him $5 a day in addition to what he had already paid. "It would have been different," the exponent of this graft explained, "if you had hired these men by the job. We were in a hurry to get through with your work, as we had another job in prospect, and as you were paying us by the day we rushed those windows, and I suppose we didn't finish them quite as nicely as we would have had to working under a written contract." We used to hear a great deal about "the horny-handed son of toil," and a vast amount of our sympathy was demanded for "the downtrodden workingman." Happily that sort of cant is now obsolete. Since the "horny-handed" and the "downtrodden" have organized themselves into unions and are using their unions in politics the horn has been manicured and the workingman has ceased to be a "doormat." In consequence, the laborer is no longer worthy of his hire unless he is bound hand and foot with an iron-clad contract. Even with that precaution you must stand over him with a club, or you risk loss by his shirking and his botching. It is gradually coming to the pass when honesty is far from being the best policy—when it is necessary that every honest man shall be deeply versed in the thievish tricks of all trades if he would save himself from robbery at the hands of the "honest workingman" in one emergency and the "predatory rich" in another.

The Comical Bulletin

The Bulletin is not usually a very comic newspaper, but occasionally it provokes the gayety of the town by its unconscious humor. Recently someone on the Bulletin staff wrote an editorial in which it was asserted that "since the beginning of its fight against the boodlers in San Francisco, the Bulletin has suppressed much startling news lest an incredulous public stamp it, without inquiry, as too improbable to credit." This is true only in so far as it relates to the suppression of "much startling news." The Bulletin has, indeed, suppressed "much startling news," but it was news that it would gladly have published if it had been favorable to the purposes of the prosecution. Otherwise there was no tale too improbable, no invention too absurd for publication in the Bulletin, provided it bore the "O. K." of William J. Burns, the "must go" of James D. Phelan, or the "release" signal of Rudolph Spreckels.

Milo

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll note the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

This perfection is obtained only by owning our own plantation in Turkey—the careful watchfulness from the seeding to the finished article.

Probability of the Incredible

For example, the Bulletin has never informed its readers that Rudolph Spreckels and "Big Jim" Gallagher had a morning conference at the Presidio in which Spreckels informed Gallagher that he had no wish to convict Ruef or Schmitz or the Supervisors, but that his sole desire was to "reach those higher up." The Bulletin has never published that Spreckels was willing to grant immunity to all the boodlers, including Ruef, if he could only procure the evidence that would convict the men that stood in the way of the accomplishment of the enterprise fathered by himself and Phelan. The Bulletin did not suppress this news because it was "startling" or because it feared that "an incredulous public" would "stamp it as too improbable to credit." Yet this news might have been suppressed for that very reason. What could be more "improbable" than the statement that an eminent and respectable citizen had entered into a conspiracy of this kind with a confessed felon? What could be more improbable than the publication of the fact that this eminent and respectable citizen had expressed himself willing to order immunity from the District Attorney for Abe Ruef, the arch boodler of the gang, if by that exercise of lenity he could "reach those higher up" against whom the Spreckels wrath had been kindled with an undying flame? Surely no improbability could surpass this improbability unless it might be the "startling news" that Gallagher blew up his own house with dynamite, having first removed the inmates to a safe distance from the explosion. The circumstance that the man that exploded the dynamite is now in the State Prison and the man that hired him to blow up the Gallagher house is so far ahead of pursuit that even William J. Burns does not know where to look for him, does not lessen the "improbability" of the suspicion. And there are many other incidents which the Bulletin has suppressed that are equally "improbable"—so improbable in truth that "an incredulous public" would be justified in disbelieving them, notwithstanding the fact that they have long been matters of record in the courts upon the testimony of reputable witnesses under oath. As I have said in the beginning the Bulletin is not ordinarily a comic newspaper, but occasionally it unconsciously makes the town laugh in response to its absurd logic, its asinine sophistry and its hypocritical pretense.

The Senior Partner—Today is your birthday, isn't it?
Chief Clerk (expectantly)—Yes, sir.
The Senior Partner—Well, don't come half an hour late tomorrow, as you did last year.

Suppressed Evidence

Interest in the crimson Biggy tragedy has been revived by the documentary evidence that has been brought to light touching the conspiracy that was formed to drive the lamented Chief of Police out of office. The Globe, which apparently is in possession of a large mass of evidence that has been studiously and artfully suppressed is clamoring for an investigation so ardently as to make the conclusion imperative that there is substantial ground for the suspicion that Biggy was the victim of a conspiracy of the most repulsive character. Furthermore the Globe's attitude seems to be justified by the inertia of the illustrious gentlemen upon whose hide the stinging editorial lash is raising purple welts of uncomfortable dimensions. The Globe is giving the distinguished gentlemen liberal doses of their own medicine, the kind that they administered through the noisome medium of the Boughten Bulletin in the heyday of the unsavory Graft Prosecution, and the patients are in a state of meek submission. The shameless Bulletin continues to drool weak venom, but that is all. Besmirched patriots are not passionately resenting the ugly imputations that are being heaped upon them. Whether from excess of prudence or the sensitive conscience that doth make cowards of us all, the philosophical demeanor of the hitherto truculent Furiosos is, to say the least, indicative of a strange metamorphosis. Perennial and pure as running water they are no longer turbulent but are flowing silently, if not tranquilly, on with limpid forbearance.

Behind the Scenes

The situation is one that invites our country cousins of the press to profitable reflection. Rampageous for two years on a steady diet of misrepresentation supplied by our brace of journalistic bawds they are now privileged to take a peep behind the scenes. Even though they lack the moral courage to confess their error, and are hopelessly wedded to a cause which they blindly and perfervidly espoused, it must be painful nevertheless to glimpse the sham and perfidy of the preposterous patriots who have been conducting a moral campaign for the regeneration of San Francisco. The curtain has not yet been lifted on the stirring melodrama. Fragmentary scenes are all that have been revealed, and they are merely suggestive of one or two minor intrigues. The dark background bristling with episodes that challenge credulity is still covered. It must be clear, however, to our country cousins that they have not enjoyed the confidence of the protagonists in this drama of criminality and infernality. It must be clear to them that the news of the immunity contract was not the only news that was kept in umbrage. It must be clear to them that the righteous ones have had much to conceal; also, that it was possible for the regenerators to employ the machinery of government to protect themselves from dread exposure, and that it was so employed.

Blinding the Public

A large canvas has been unfolded to the view, but I doubt whether our country cousins will be able to apprehend the picture in all its luminous details. It must dawn on their perceptive faculties, however, that the Bokes and the Olders who have been howling about newspaper misrepresentation, who have sought by villification and intimidation to throttle the press, were after all, not eager that the public should know all that was occurring in this city. If they will consider the present timid attitude of the Examiner, the once newsy monarch, that is now suppressing the news of the Biggy scandal, a flood of inspiration may come to them. It is not my purpose to deride the country press for its hospitality to an obsession. It would be unjust to do so. Even the average citizen living right in the heart of San Francisco has been in ignorance of much that has been happening. He is now in a state of revolt, for he has learned by the slow process of mouth-to-mouth communication a little of what the daily newspapers have suppressed. The old maxim that truth will out has been exemplified in San Francisco. The truth—some of it—has percolated through a dense mass of misrepresentation. Public sentiment was somewhat enlightened even before the Globe published the story of the conspiracy to seize the police department for unholy purposes not entirely related to the ostensible object of our sacrosanct benefactors. Public sentiment has revolted against the nefarious scheming of the men who have had the community by the ears, but public sentiment was a long time impervious to the rays of truth. The most notable of all the achievements of the graft prosecution was the deception of the public. The history of this phase of the great conspiracy, of the methods employed to darken the understanding, to give false impressions of current events, to suggestionize the unwary, is most instructive. It ought to be written for the benefit of editors and ministers who are disposed to comment on matters of which they have no personal knowledge. It might serve to restrain impulsive ladies from identifying themselves with a cause of which they may some day be heartily ashamed.

If McNab Were Poundkeeper

"Is it true," Gavin McNab was asked the other day, "that Mayor Taylor intends to appoint you poundkeeper?"

"I don't think so," said McNab, a bland smile overspreading his countenance. "Mayor Taylor knows that I regard public office as a public trust, and that in the performance of my duty I would play no favorites. The Mayor will not take the chance of having his doggerel impounded."

The Political Pot

The political situation so far as municipal politics is concerned is still in a nebulous state, but one hears many rumors of combinations to be made in the interest of certain ambitious gentlemen with a keen appetite for public office. The gentlemen behind the present Administration are reputed to be very active, but it is said that their plans have not yet been matured. They have determined on nothing except the advisability of plunging with the money of the taxpayers for the purpose of stimulating the labor market and capturing the labor vote. It is said that before election public improvements will be projected on a gigantic scale. Furthermore it is said that they are ready to make any kind of deal that will insure them control of the district attorney's office. To that end they will turn the rest of the municipal government over to Mr. Herrin or to any man or faction that can guarantee them the consummation they so devoutly wish. They hope to be able to slip their candidate through in a three-cornered fight, and they will embrace anybody that can arrange the propitious situation. Meanwhile the candidacy of the Hon. Frank J. Sullivan is attracting some attention. Mr. Sullivan hopes to be the labor candidate for Mayor, and his friends are pointing with pride to the fact that he has repudiated brother-in-law Phelan, but there are shrewd politicians that regard the Sullivan-Phelan scrap as a hippodrome. They say that Jimmy can make Frank eat out of his hand, and they regard the spectacular family row as a Phelan stratagem designed to facilitate the gallant young millionaire's return to power as boss of the city government. Among the labor politicians Mr. Sullivan is not taken seriously. Some of the most influential of them are urging County Clerk Mulcrevy to become a candidate, but that gentleman announced at a banquet given in his honor last Saturday that he was not a candidate for any office; that he would abide by the decision of the Labor Party. At that banquet were many prominent citizens, among them judges of the Superior Court and representatives of the bar and they bestowed on the County Clerk the highest encomiums. Mulcrevy's record in public office is without a flaw. He is the most efficient County Clerk this city has ever had. Judge Troutt said at the banquet that Mulcrevy was fit for the highest office in the State.

a novel writer. The program arranged by the Women's Press Association afforded opportunity for Mr. Morrow's friends and admirers to show their personal appreciation of his work and to express their high regard for him as a man. Not only has Mr. Morrow contributed a vital and enduring quality to the literature of California, but he has impressed the personality of his own genius upon a large body of those who will make the Californian literature of the future. His teaching has been with him a labor of love. It has been rooted in a rich and nourishing sympathy that has blossomed into the sort of optimism that gladdens the heart of the disheartened and by its good sense, its wise counsel and its sincere encouragement has compelled successful effort in the very depths of failure. This has been W. C. Morrow's noblest work because it has made men and women happier and more useful. But he has also done much for the literature of the West—more, perhaps, than any other prose writer since Bret Harte, and more than that pioneer exemplar of indigenous literary form in variety of his literary expression and solidity of purpose. On the foundation of the early Californian structure Morrow has erected an imposing and substantial edifice that shall in time to come be as a portal and a vestibule to a beautiful and everlasting temple of art. The product of his genius has depth, psychological insight, strength, and intellectual force. It will endure as all things worth while endure, and it will permeate and color the literature of the western peoples long after that literature has attained its full dignity as a separate and distinctive entity among the literatures of the world.

Our Building Record

San Francisco stood fourth in the list of large cities in the United States reporting their building operations to Bradstreet's for the month of March, despite the fact that the building permits were not so numerous as in March, 1908, while the three cities preceding and those following San Francisco in the list showed a very large percentage of increase over the corresponding month of last year. Of course this city was more actively concerned with rehabilitation then than now, when the progress of time has brought conditions nearer to a normal basis. For March of this year, New York City had a record of $28,627,000, a gain of more than four hundred per cent over a year ago; Chicago, $8,146,000; Philadelphia, $3,858,000, and San Francisco, $3,336,000. Although the census of 1900 places San Francisco but ninth in the list of large cities, its building expenditures for the month of March exceeded those of the big eastern cities which surpassed it in population. St. Louis was fifth in the list, with a total of $2,675,000 for building operations; Seattle had $2,562,000; Kansas City, $1,708,953; and Washington, D. C., $1,441,000. It is of interest to note in connection with these figures that the grand total value of building permitted in ninety-five cities for March represented an increase of over eighty per cent above the total for the corresponding month of 1908.

Back to San Francisco

Mrs. W. F. Morris is again established in the hotel business in San Francisco. Before the fire the Cecil, under her management, was one of the leading hotels of the city. After the fire she brought the Carlton of Berkeley into popularity, and made of it one of the most fashionable of the family hotels on the other side of the bay. Mrs. Morris recently assumed the management of the Victoria Hotel.

The Financial Outlook

Stocks

We have seen a traders' stock market for some days with indications of a broadening tendency. The disturbance abroad has little or no effect on American securities. The market has been spotted, more than ordinary strength appearing in special stocks. Many organized pools are awaiting a favorable opportunity to put their favorities to a higher price level. The Gould stocks have been active and strong. Western Pacific stock has taken on new life, 29 being bid for a large block. There is very little of this stock offering. I still believe it will sell at 50 before a through train passes over its road. I am told on good authority that American Woolen Common and Preferred will sell materially higher. It is about time that Katy should make good its well tipped upward movement. I consider Northern Pacific one of the best purchases on the market. From general appearances I am anticipating a big advance all along the Security list during the next month. Locally stocks and bonds are in good demand. Telephone Common and Preferred will sell very much higher. Easterners are disposed to consider them with favor.

Grain

It was an eventful week for the wheat trade. The highest prices of the week were made Thursday when May reached 129½ and July 118⅞. That was the climax. The close Saturday for July was within ¼c of high point. The early strength was due to small worlds shipments, reduced supplies afloat, strong and higher foreign markets, promise of small supplies from south of the equator for Europe and decrease in the visible supply in this country. Continued buying of cash wheat at Chicago and at all winter wheat points by interior mills at fancy prices. The trade for days was flooded with bad crop reports which were modified later because of good rains, although the last day of the week brought many bad complaints from many of the biggest wheat counties in Kansas. The Patten position has been fiercely assailed through the press by Eastern bear interests which got hurt by millers and bakers who are somewhat demoralized by the high prices and by sensational writers who have tried to create antagonism against the bull leader on the part of Washington authorities. The condition of growing crops is at least doubtful. It will be a short harvest and probably a late one. Everything now points to an advance for July equal if not greater than that already recorded in May contracts. The situation is the most unusual one the wheat trade has seen in years.

Cotton

The revival of speculative interest in the Cotton Market is at hand. Operators in stocks, grain, meats and other commodities that have been high for a long time are now turning their attention to Cotton, believing that it is the cheapest commodity on the market even at the present level of prices. The New Orleans Times Democrat in a statement which has received much credence among experienced cotton men, says that there is carried in the present visible supply at least 500,000 bales of linters or un-spinnable cotton. If this is even approximately correct it is safe to say that at least 300,000 bales of these linters were added this year as the last census report allowed 344,000 bales of linters from the growth of 1908, making it apparent that although the crop of 1908-09 was perhaps two millions bales larger than last year's crop of 11,500,000 bales, that all of this surplus has been absorbed leaving the visible supply 300,000 bales less than last year at this time and 700,000 bales less than at this time in 1907. Spinners have acquired the greater portion of this season's crop at the lowest average prices in five years, the farmer having parted with the bulk of his cotton at the very lowest prices of the season around 8¼c per pound for middling. Because of the addition of 5,000,000 new spindles to the world's consuming power during the past year, and on account of the East Indian crop falling 500,000 bales short of early expectations, European spinners as well as domestic mills have yet to buy a great deal more of American cotton than would otherwise have been the case, but they can well afford to pay 15c per pound for the balance of their needs in order to obtain much higher prices for the finished product. There are many indications that trade the world over is rapidly improving and everything indicates that large purchases of cotton goods must soon be made to replenish stocks which were allowed to run down in this country as well as in Europe during the late financial depression. A few years ago Chinese purchases of cotton goods from the United States reached the enormous total of $30,000,000 in a single year and then came the Chinese boycott, since this time China has practically been out of the market for our goods and as a result shelves in China have been pretty well cleaned off. Now that friendly relations have been restored, the continued heavy buying of China has been the leading feature in New England Dry Goods Circles ever since the Chinese New Year and there is every assurance that this buying is to continue for some time to come. In view of these facts it would seem that the cotton bear will not only have to buck an enthusiastic public, backed by one of the strongest of statistical positions, but he will have the unlimited capital of the manufacturing and spinning industries of the world arrayed against him. The rapidly increasing production of gold means a steady decrease in the value of money, very much higher prices for everything must therefore be the inevitable result. All of these influences would seem to point to a summer season of advancing prices and more active speculation than has ever before been experienced and I am inclined to believe that before this wave of optimism shall have subsided the cotton market will experience higher prices than those attained in the spring of 1904 when July cotton in New York sold at 17½ cents in the face of the largest crop on record.

She Was so Unconventional

The indications are that Santa Barbara will have the gayest season the southern city has ever known. The girls down there, by the way, are still aghast at the smashing of some of their most treasured traditions during the influx of visitors for the polo grames. Eleanor Sears, it will be remembered, was with the Hobarts, and she broke the record for unconventionality even amongst the unconventional. Social amenities simply did not exist for her. At the two or three balls which she attended at the Potter, she was gowned in her wonderful Parisian trained costumes, and rather staggered the natives when she saw fit to vault the railing instead of walking round to the entrance. She manipulated her train with rare grace and dexterity, too, and was an object of silent envy to the many girls who cannot cross a three-bar fence without entangling themselves midway. When she desired a word with her partner and he—whoever he chanced to be—was not in sight, she stood outside the ball room door and called his name, and as hers is a voice that carries well, she never had long to wait. Her popularity was manifestly so great that now she has departed, the Santa Barbara girls are trying to screw their courage up to the point of emulation, for they have begun to take notice that it is always the outsiders who carry off their eligibles. San Franciscans have more than once assumed the reins of leadership, and the Barbarinos have meekly dropped into line. Miss Nina Jones, however, is now the leader of the younger set and invitations to her parties and other pleasures are eagerly anticipated. Susanne Kirkpatrick was her guest last month, and Harriet Alexander is to visit her in the month of May. Others who will leave shortly for Santa Barbara are the Andrew Welches, the William Davises and the Harry Stetsons.

An Artist's Marriage

The wedding of Charles Rollo Peters and Mrs. Constance Easley was as much of a surprise to the artist's family as to his friends at large. His first wife, who died about seven years ago, was Miss Kathleen Murphy, a well known teacher of this city. She left several children, the eldest of whom is now about sixteen and the youngest seven years of age. Even the most intimate friends had not an inkling of the intended marriage. On the morning of the day set for his wedding Mr. Peters telegraphed to his mother and his sister, Mrs. Robert Woods, to come to Monterey by the morning train and when they arrived he broke the news to them. Mrs. Schmeidell, his aunt, was on a visit to this city, and to

The Presidio Country Dance

The country dance given by the ladies of the Presidio was an unqualified success. The originality of the affair is due to Mrs. John Lundeen, while the unique invitation, written in verse, was the inspiration of Mrs. Paul Beck. Through the efforts of these ladies the hop room will be supplied with many attractive accessories. The invitations requested each of the young ladies to supply a basket containing edibles suitable for a picnic, secreted amongst the generous contents of which was the card of the donor, and after thirteen lively dances, an auction was held, Lieutenant M. L. Randall officiating. Some of the baskets brought fancy prices, as high as seven dollars and a half being bid. Many of the young girls attired themselves in picnic costume, and a pretty sight they presented in the grand march, led by Colonel Lundeen and his partner. Miss Genevieve Walker was noticeable in a becoming pink calico, and her basket, trimmed with pink crape paper and adorned with a bunch of pink sweet peas, with a ginger ale bottle in evidence, was one of the prettiest, where all were noticeably pretty. Miss Anna Weller was in a sailor suit, and Miss Dichman in pink dimity. Among the men, Captain Hazard's costume provoked much merriment. He impersonated an elderly rural grocer, in old trousers, shoes without laces, and a ball of twine dropping out of his pocket. Lieutenant Jones was attired as a cowboy. The dance was restricted to members of the post, with only a few outsiders. Some enjoyable dinners preceded the affairs, amongst them that of Mrs. Sterling P. Adams in honor of Miss Bessie-Louise Dichman and Lieutenant Thurman Bane.

The Thomas-Sefton Wedding

The marriage of Helen Thomas and Joseph Sefton, which took place on Friday afternoon, was one of the prettiest of the informal weddings of the year. Trinity Chapel was beautifully decorated for the occasion, and the favored few invited to witness the ceremony occupied the entire seating capacity. The wedding procession was unique. Helen Thomas had selected no bridesmaids, as she wished everything as simple as possible, but four of her most intimate friends, Sydney Davis, Janet Coleman, Julia Langhorne and Helen Baker, appointed themselves a body guard, and preceded the bride to the altar, while Julia Thomas officiated as maid of honor. In consequence there was no little incongruity in the color scheme which presented itself, pink and purple predominating. The bride entered the chapel unattended, and created some comment by the fact that she slid smilingly to meet the groom for fully one-half the length of the aisle. She was as much at her ease as the bride of a few seasons ago who swung round on her heel from the altar and greeted the assembled guests with a call of "Rubber!" With the Seftons it seemed just an everyday performance, they were so completely at their ease, even to the holding of an impromptu reception right outside the chapel. Only the two families and the bridal party were invited to the breakfast. Helen Sefton was voted the prettiest bride of the season, and the only regret which attends her marriage is that San Diego will be her future home. However, as Joseph Sefton is reputed to be a multimillionaire, frequent northward trips are to be expected, and already the bridal party are anticipating visits to her southern home. In the course of the coming month Mrs. Wolcott Thomas and her younger daughter, Julia, expect to leave for Europe. They have decided on taking an apartment in Vienna for a couple of years, and Julia will devote her time to the study of music, for which she has decided talent.

Stole a March on Their Friends

Friends of Miss Mildred Miller, the attractive young ward of Mr. and Mrs. Howard J. Perazzi, and of Robert Levy, a promising young business man of this city, will be surprised to learn of their quiet marriage in Santa Rosa on the twenty-fourth of last March. The engagement had been announced several weeks previous, with an intimation that the wedding would take place in September, but the young people decided to avoid the delay as well as the excitement, and made a quiet trip to the inland city without giving notice to any one. They are residing temporarily with Mr. and Mrs. Perazzi at their home on Leavenworth street until their own apartments are ready for them. Mr. Levy is connected with the Verdier Company.

The Sausalito Smart Set

Sausalito is rapidly gaining summer residents and has been very gay for the last week or so. Mrs. A. A. Watkins gave an enjoyable luncheon for Mrs. Tomilson, who was formerly the interesting Edith Miller. Miss Josephine Beedy made Mrs. H. Clay Miller Jr. the motif of a handsomely appointed tea at her home during the week and was also hostess at a luncheon in honor of Mrs. Frank Mitchell, formerly Florence Gardiner, and one of the prettiest brides of the season. Mrs. Herbert Baldwin, nee Reed, Mrs. Frank Findley and Mrs. Louise Beedy also gave teas, the guests on the last two occasions being the members of a sewing circle which draws its membership from the "hill set," the social arbiters of the little town. Mrs. J. Hanify of The Moorings will give a tea next week in honor of Mrs. A. A. Watkins of Sausalito, who will leave on April 28th to visit her daughter, now the wife of Captain Orrin Wolfe, at Fort Seward, Alaska. Mrs. H. Clay Miller will also entertain in honor of Mrs. Watkins before her departure. Mrs Watkins is the wife of Captain A. A. Watkins, very old residents of Sausalito. The marriage of Mabel Watkins to Captain Wolfe, U. S. A., about two years ago, was a social event of some magnitude.

Now For the Fete du Printemps

The Kermess and the Mardi Gras ball of the Colonials gave a local vogue to costume affairs which has incited society hostesses to emulation in designing entertainments at which artistic effects in dress are the feature. Now comes the benefit for the French Mission for Homeless Children which is to serve as a pretext for exercising both skill and Christian charity. The "Fete du Printemps" will be held in the Colonial ball room of the St. Francis on April 28, and will introduce the latest London fad in color effects. This is entirely a matter of costume. The dress of each maid or matron who is to take an active part in the charity work will be a gown of white lace or embroidery in lingerie effect, and a large black picture hat adorned with one gorgeous red rose. The participants in the affair, who are meeting regularly at the home of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, are endeavoring to preserve secrecy, and some surprises are expected. It is known that Miss Helene Irwin, Miss Mary Keeney, Miss Florence Hopkins and Miss Julia Langhorne will preside at the flower booth; Mrs. Oscar Cooper and Mrs. George Cameron will dispense candy, and a variety of alluring games will be in charge of Mrs. Walter Martin, Miss Jennie Crocker, Mrs. Frederick McNear and Mrs. Will Taylor. Shrouded in a veil of discreet mystery are the identity of the seeress who is to reveal the past, pres-

A Suggestive Figure

Though the decrees of fashion still demand that feminine garments shall be of the tight and clinging order, there is some promise of modification, and none too soon, for the prevailing models in the directoire style often follow the lines of nature so closely as to leave nothing to the imagination. The narrow skirts oblige the wearers to restrict themselves to short, pattering steps, and the effect is not always agreeable. I was reminded of this the other day when there passed on the avenue a young woman in society. She was beautifully attired in a calling gown of the latest style, so closely fitted as to confine her steps to a stride of not more than two inches. As she trotted along, said one well known clubman to another: "There goes Mrs. ——— whom we used to known in Stockton." "Where?" asked his companion. "Why, right ahead of us—doesn't she look for all the world as if she had just crawled into a leg of her husband's pants?"

Among the Artists

A number of pictures were sold from the Del Monte art gallery during the past month. Louis Hill, president of the Northern Pacific Railroad, carried home with him a large canvas of C. Chapel Judson's, entitled "Among the Oaks," and considered by some of his brother artists the best piece of work yet produced by Judson. A delightful bit of the bay of Monterey by Eugene Neuhaus goes to Chicago with Mr. Charles J. Davis, president of the Rothschild Company. Many will remember Eldridge A. Burbank's medal picture of the old man with the horn, painted in Munich, and a very good example of the Munich school. It was so admired by Fred B. Snyder of Minneapolis that he has added it to his collection. Mr. Burbank is now in Southern California, making studies of Indians. Some other canvasses are under consideration by prospective buyers, who have not yet reached their final decision. Miss Isabel Hunter, whose "Lonely Road" was awarded the Philopolis prize at the Sketch Club Exhibition last week, has a charming "Moonrise over Monterey" in the gallery, and not far from it hangs Miss Mary Brady's "Roadside Oaks," the study that gained the Philopolis prize last year. The latest acquisitions to the gallery are two of Sydney Yard's pictures— one, a water color of a hillside with sheep, low in tone, restful and poetic, the other a good sized oil of eucalyptus trees, strong yet atmospheric. William Keith, the dean of California painters, has consented to serve on the new jury. It has been reported several times recently that the jury was composed principally of women, but, so far from this being the fact, only two of the seven jurors belong to "the sex," Mrs. Mary Curtis Richardson and Miss Evelyn McCormick, the other members being Dr. Arnold Genthe, Gottardo Piazzoni, James King Steele and Will Sparks. Lockwood de Forest, a well known New York artist, member of the Lamb's, Century and Salmagundi Clubs, has been painting at

Nazimova on the Hope Ranch

The news comes from Santa Barbara that Mme. Nazimova, the gifted Russian actress spent a whole day on the Hope Ranch and at the Potter Country Club. G. O. France who is in charge of the sales of the Hope Ranch took her over the place in an automobile, accompanied by a number of her friends. Madame Nazimova was most enthusiatic over the beauties of this property saying that it was "the most charming and characteristically Californian spot she had seen in the whole State." Its superb situation suggested to her the Bay of Naples and the Riviera. "If I can ever arrange to spend a part of each year in California," she added, "here is where I shall live."

Dr. and Mrs. P. L. Wheeler and Master Kirkham Wheeler, who have been traveling in the east for the past three months, have returned to their home in this city.

The two affairs which, by their size and the daintiness of their appointments, created the greatest interest of all the many teas given in the Laurel Court of the Fairmont on Monday were the Navy tea given by Mrs. John McMullin for her niece, and that of Mrs. E. J. Benedict, following her bridge party. Thirty guests accepted her hospitality. Mrs. McMullin, who has just returned to her apartments after a lengthy sojourn in the south, entertained the younger officers of the Pennsylvania, which has returned from Magdalena Bay to receive the Japanese cruisers with appropriate honors. Among the younger friends of Mrs. McMullin who were present were Miss Eliza McMullin, Miss Genevieve Walker, Miss Ynez Keeney, Miss Peggy Simpson and Miss Augusta Foute.

Mrs. Henry Stevens Kiersted is visiting her mother, Mrs. P. McG. McBean at the Fairmont, and is being lavishly entertained. She came up from the Presidio at Monterey, where Dr. Kiersted is stationed, and will remain until after the marriage of her brother, Athol McBean and Miss Margaret Newhall. Mrs. Kiersted is planning a number of entertainments for her friends during her stay.

Some of the guests now at Del Monte are Mrs. Arichie Borland, Mrs. Edward Von Adelung and her children, Edward Jr., Archibald and Agnes, from Oakland; Mrs. Walter M. Hart from Berkeley; Dr. Arnold Genthe, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Keegan, Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Ladd of Portland, Oregon, and their sons, Henry A. and Charles T. Ladd; James King Steele, William H. Bull, Mr. and Mrs. Cyril E. Maud and Mrs. Maud's son, E. Clinton LaMontague, Mr. and Mrs. R. M. Loeser of Stanford.

Eighteen tables in the Colonial ball room of the St. Francis were prettily arranged for the guests of Mrs. Harry Rice Mann, who enjoyed an afternoon of bridge, followed by refreshments in the white and gold room. Pretty Dresden china cake dishes were the prizes.

At an informal luncheon in the St. Francis last Wednesday were gathered Mrs. John C. Wilson, Mrs. Thomas Eastland, Miss Cecilia O'Connor and Miss Virginia Jolliffe.

Mrs. C. August Spreckels entertained informally at luncheon in the St. Francis a few days ago, having among her guests Mrs. W. G. Irwin, Mrs. Charlen O. Alexander and Mrs. Montfor Wilson. Mr. and Mrs. Spreckels are making their home at the St. Francis for the present.

TODAY AND YESTERDAY

There rode in the golden olden days
A horseman through the town;
And many a gentle maid would gaze
From a rose-hung casement down.

He greeted her; then, quick and glad
She seized her handkerchief
And waved until the gallant lad
Was gone; then wept for grief.

The autoists, in these iron days,
Around the corner steer;
And many a gentle maid will gaze
From a window, half in fear.

The scent borne to them on the breeze
Is not, as then, of roses;
They sniff, their handkerchiefs they seize—
And hold them to their noses!

The New Orpheum

By Theodore Bonnet

With the rest of the panegyrists of the press I come with my homage to the owners of the Orpheum and burn incense to them in token of my appreciation of their worth as public benefactors. They are entitled to much praise. They have dedicated a beautiful temple to our amusement, and that is something more deserving of commendation than anything that has been done in the new San Francisco by any of our most self-sacrificing civic patriots. As next to our spiritual interests there is nothing so important as our refined sensuous appetites, they that minister to them with wisdom and zeal are entitled to our highest esteem. The new Orpheum vindicates both the wisdom and zeal of its owners. With one exception it is the most beautiful theatre this city has ever seen, the one exception being the Grand Opera House in the days of its infancy, before its ornaments were sent to the junk-heap. The auditorium of the new theatre is hardly surpassed for sheer beauty by any theatre in the country. There are more costly interiors, but none that, taken as a whole, present a more perfect blend of coloring, a more striking harmony of ornamentation. Connoisseurs may tell us that there is need of a little Doric severity to temper the lavishness of ornamentation, for connoisseurs are persons that conceive it to be their mission to discover imperfections. The first-night audience, by the way, seemed to be composed of connoisseurs, so little emotion did it betray. The lure of art, decorative beauty, frescoes that give the most pleasing impression of color and form, the pictorial embodiment of ideas—apparently none of these things appealed to the senses or the imagination of that vast throng. Despite all that was there for the bedazzlement of us, notwithstanding the sentiment that should have been born of the occasion, the circumstances that should have swayed the emotions, the audience, seemingly constrained by a false sense of decorum, behaved as though it had resolved to defy the management to make good. I must confess that I was disappointed. Before entering the theatre I expected to witness a stirring display of enthusiasm. Outside there was tremendous animation. It appeared as though all the automobiles in town had been pressed into service for the occasion, and that the Orpheum had become the civic center to which all roads converged. Inside, the audience, stolid, well-groomed, impervious to the warmth of environment, was on its best parlor behaviour. When Mr. John Morrissey, wreathed in smiles, came out to make the announcement that the City's Chief Magistrate would favor us with a few felicitous remarks, there was some applause but no splitting of gloves. Mayor Taylor was as cordially greeted as though he had been billed to deliver a lecture on "The Moral Issue." His flowers of rhetoric, nipped in the chill breeze that rose from the orchestra seats, he rounded a few periods with simulated fervor that won him polite approbation. The first faint semblance of enthusiasm was shown when Zelie de Lussan showered her golden notes on us in the melodious Star Spangled Banner. Here was the psychological moment for a passionate outburst, but it passed unheeded. Surely, thought I, when they take note of the drop curtain they will express their approval of the banishment of the old ad-covered monstrosity; they will call for Morris Meyerfeld, the prophet of the new era, compel him to take the bushel off his light and contribute a few modest blushes to the occasion, but Aurora came and—no awakening. Over nothing but the performance did the audience enthuse, and over that, not very much, though it is a rattling good one. Barring the burlesque Roman act, which reaches the nadir of inanity, the opening show stacked up to the occasion. There is nothing sensational on the bill, but there are several excellent acts, the skit on the telephone operator being, perhaps, the most striking from the standpoint of originality and in the matter of fidelity to type. The aerial ballet, with its flock of pigeons, is one of the most chaste and picturesque I have ever seen in vaudeville, and Fogarty, the yarn spinner, sandwiches fewer antiques into his meaty collection of absurdities than any of the monologists with whom we are familiar. The performance winds up with a moving picture that takes you down Market street in the days of yore, a picture that would move a wooden Indian, but that first-night audience, as I have said was undemonstrative. I wonder if, having had so much excitement crowded into our lives, our emotional resources have been exhausted.

Stage

The Playing of Elman

Tuesday evening was marked by two events which will help to make musical history in San Francisco. One was the opening of the Garrick Theatre under the management of Will Greenbaum, and the other was the first appearance of Mischa Elman the much heralded Russian violinist. Elman has a very decided personality. He has a small, nervous and wiry frame, a large head, much facial expression, and an acrobatic manner of playing. His mannerisms are peculiar, he swavs from side to side, lifts his body from one foot to the other, opens and shuts his eyes, moves his head up and down, and at times lifts his violin up to his bow. Yet the result is a beautiful golden tone, and a manner of interpretation instinct with soul and feeling. This his hearers had their first chance to discover in the andante of the Solo Symphony Espagnol. In no part of his program was there any great display of technique as such. In his third number, a group of dances beginning with a Beethoven minuet was he at his best. Neither in the Spanish Symphony nor in the Handel Sonata in E minor was there any great display of sentiment or artistic feeling. The smaller forms brought this out. The little minuet, a charming airy thing, was played with delicacy and grace. Elman was at his best in the last two groups on his program. These numbers, including the Schubert-Wilhelmj Ave Maria were marked by feeling, purity of tone and the resources of a finished technique. Mischa Elman is an original. The expression "not a prodigy but a genius" is quite a correct epitome of the artist and his style. By means indescribable he finds the inward soul of his hearers. Rounds of applause greeted his different numbers and insistent demands for encores drew him again and again to the platform.

The Carrick Recital

True music lovers gathered in the Colonial ball room of the St. Francis on Thursday evening, April 20, for the piano recital of Miss Mary Carrick. The program was a most difficult one, affording an excellent opportunity for the display of her technique. Variations on a Theme of Pagannini, Op. 35, by Brahms, and Grosses Konzert Solo, E minor, by Liszt, were a great treat, as these numbers have not been played here before. In the Liszt selection Miss Carrick displayed rare ability in subduing the bass in difficult passages, and charmed a sophisticated audience. The familiar Etude de Concert, by Poldini, Op. 19, was highly appreciated as an encore, after the heavy program of the evening.

The Nazimova Engagement

Madame Nazimova's engagement at the Van Ness Theatre will mark the first appearance in San Francisco of an interesting personage in contemporary drama, and will be of further interest because this Russian player will present three plays that are new to local theatre-goers. There is of course considerable interest in this Russian actress who has been so extensively exploited in the press and who has been compared both to Duse and Bernhardt. One point of special interest in her performances is that they are entirely in English. The Shuberts have sent her on tour with the same able company which supported her during her metropolitan engagements and she comes with the promise that the five plays in her repertoire will be handsomely and completely mounted and staged. Since Nazimova made her first appearance in English in New York she has been recognized as a great star. If reviewers differ in their views of her conception of the Ibsen plays all have pronounced her a great artist and a woman of beauty. Playing the repertoire that she has selected she is enabled to offer three characters that are in every way widely dissimilar. As "Nora" in "A Doll's House" she is the romping, care-free girl who develops into a woman with swift awakening to the fact that she has a soul. In "Hedda" she is the tall and serpentine woman full of mysticism and poses. During the first week of Nazimova's engagement she will be seen in "A Doll's House"; during the second week she will present "Hedda Gabler" and "Comtesse Coquette." Matinees Wednesday and Saturday.

BEN GREET

The Shakespearean Festival

The week of Shakespearean plays at the Garrick Theatre by the Ben Greet players and The Russian Symphony Orchestra of New York, numbering over one hundred performers, promises to be the great event of the dramatic season. Just think of it! a famous company of players and a great symphony orchestra combined in interpretations of these wonderful plays with the music composed for them by some of the greatest musicians that have ever lived. The dramatic portion of the productions will be under the personal supervision of Ben Greet. Modest Altschuler is the conductor of the orchestra. The repertoire includes "A Midsummer Night's Dream" with the complete Mendelssohn music, "The Tempest" with Tschaikowsky's and Sir Arthur Sullivan's music, "Romeo and Juliet" with Tschaikowsky's and Gounod's music. By special request Mr. Greet will give a Thursday matinee performance of "Everyman" to which Altschuler has adapted music from Wagner's "Parsifal." From all reports the productions of this organization have never been equalled in this country. By invitation of the Faculty of the University two special performance will be given at the Greek Theatre in Berkeley. The first will be on Saturday night, May 1st. "A Midsummer Night's Dream" will be the offering. On Saturday afternoon, May 8th, "The Tempest" will be given. Seats for the Greek Theatre will be on sale at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s, San Francisco and Oakland, and at the usual places in Berkeley. If Greenbaum gets many more attractions for the Garrick like those he has thus far booked that theatre will be the Mecca for the true lovers of the artistic.

"Old Heidelberg" Again

The heart-warming epic of youth, "Old Heidelberg," will be revived next Monday evening at the Alcazar, with a cast that would assure a successful run even if the play were not equipped with the most elaborate scene settings ever provided for the production. Those who witnessed this charming stage-story of German student life in the Sutter street house about two years ago will be gratified to learn that with only one exception the cast of principals will be the same. Evelyn Vaughan is to play Kathie, the maid of the inn, and as she toured the eastern circuit in the part it is safe to predict that she will give it a charming portrayal. Bertram Lytell will again be seen as Prince Karl, the role in which he made his first distinct hit at the Alcazar, and the student songs will be sung by a band of capable vocalists recruited by Stage Director Butler and led by a double quartet. "Old Heidelberg" was adapted from the German for the late Richard Mansfield, whose most successful vehicle it was.

The Burton Holmes Travelogues

Next Thursday night at Christian Science Hall a jolly trip around the interesting city of "Berlin" and some of its surrounding places will be taken by those who attend the Burton Holmes Travelogues. This season Mr. Holmes is attending to the picture end of his business and the Travelogues are being delivered by Mr. Wright Kramer, his traveling companion, who is a splendid speaker and an actor of repute. Five subjects are to be given viz., "Berlin, "Vienna," "Paris," "London" and "Fez" in the order named. Each will be given three times in succession so that subscribers need go but twice a week in order to hear them all. This course is said to be one of the most interesting of any that Mr. Holmes has prepared. See the complete schedule in our regular amusement column. The sale of seats is in progress at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s, corner of Sutter and Kearny streets, and season tickets are still to be secured. A course of three Travelogues is to be given in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse on successive Friday afternoons at 3:30. The first will be next week on April 30th, and "Berlin" the subject. This will be followed by "Paris" and "Fez."

At the Princess

The Princess offers an exceptionally attractive program next week in George Vance and Howard Talbot's comedy, "A Chinese Honeymoon," which ran for an entire season at the New York Casino. It will be elaborately and picturesquely staged, and the cast will be of unusual excellence. Fred Mace, May Boley, Helen Darling, Zoe Barnett, Ethel DuPre Houston, James S. Stevens, Budd Ross, Bert Phoenix, Oliver LeMoir and all the Princess favorites will be congenially placed. The beautiful girl chorus will be in attractive evidence in new and handsome costumes. There is every reason to assume that "A Chinese Honeymoon" will duplicate in this city the success it scored in the east. The Princess is eminently worthy of public patronage for it is giving productions and performances at popular prices which excel in every particular many for which $2 have been charged.

The Mischa Elman Sunday Concert

A great crowd of music lovers will throng the Garrick Theatre on Sunday afternoon to hear the magnificent program of Mischa Elman, the young genius, whose advent into the world of music has set an entirely new standard for violin playing. The exceptional program will include Saint-Saens' Concerto in B minor, "Chaconne" by Bach, "Faust Fantasie" by Wieniawski, Saraste's "Habanera" and "Parapharase on the Prize Song" from "Die Meistersinger" Wagner-Wilhelmj. Seats will be on sale at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s, corner Sutter and Kearny until five o'clock Saturday afternoon and on Sunday at the theatre box office after ten. Telephone 1194. Manager Greenbaum announces that if arrangements can be completed Elman will return for Sunday, May 2, and give the greatest concert this city has ever known. The magnificent Russian Symphony Orchestra under Modest Altschuler will be brought there one day ahead of the Ben Greet Company and will play with the young genius the Tschaikowsky and Mendelssohn violin concertos.

Minstrels at the American

The last performances of "Right's Might," the interesting play by Frank McGlynn and Jack Gleason, will take place at the American Theatre this Saturday afternoon and evening and at the Sunday matinee I. P. Wilkerson's "Minstrels of ToDay" and Musical Comedy Company will open a summer season which promises to be decidedly interesting. The very best burnt cork artists obtainable have been engaged. For the opening program the end men will be Al. Jolson, late of Dockstader's minstrels. Emil Subers, "The Georgia Sunflower," well-known here from his clever work at the Orpheum, John H. King, fresh from Cohan and Harris' "Honey Boy Minstrels," Tod Bloom, Eddie Mazie, and the Forbes Brothers, one of the best singing and dancing teams before the public. The vocalists who will be heard from the charmed semi-circle are Matt Keefe, a San Francisco boy who comes covered with eastern triumphs with the "Honey Boy Minstrels," Will Oakland, the contra tenor who made a hit here last season with Dockstader's Minstrels, Tell Taylor, the baritone who sings his own songs, and Frank Figoni, the basso.

"If I Were King"

The last performances of J. M. Barrie's delightful fantasy, "Peter Pan," will take place at the Valencia Theatre this Saturday and Sunday afternoons and evenings and on Monday night "If I Were King," dramatized by Justin Huntley McCarthy from his popular novel of the same name, will be staged on an elaborate scale. It is a historical comedy-drama in which E. H. Sothern starred with great success for two seasons, scoring an artistic triumph in this city at the Columbia Theatre before the fire and which he is again presenting at Daly's Theatre, New York City. The story centres around Francois Villon, the erratic literary genius and vagabond poet, whose verses kept intellectual France agrin during the reign of Louis XI. When the play opens the ribald poet is spouting an impromptu poem berating the king and boasting of what the author would do to better the people's condition if he were on the throne. The protelariat are wildly applauding the poet's utterances when the king himself steps in, and taking the boaster at his word appoints him monarch for a week, and informs him that if he does not make good his boasts he will be gibbeted. Among the conditions imposed upon Villon is one which provides that he must within the week, win the love of Katherine de Vaucelles, whose heart Louis has in vain tried to touch. At the end of the week the temporary monarch seems no nearer gaining the woman's love than he was at first and he is about to be led away to his execution when she astounds all by volunteering to take his place. Thus the ending is happy. "If I Were King" will serve to introduce to San Francisco Mr. Paul McAllister and Miss Florence Oakley, the new leading man and woman of the Valencia Stock Company and to reintroduce an old, tried and true favorite, Mr. George Osbourne. Mr. McAllister comes direct from a series of New York dramatic triumphs, Miss Oakley is one of the best of America's younger leading women and Mr. Osbourne may safely be said to be the most popular actor who ever appeared in this city.

Mrs. Ben Lathrop's Concert

In society as well as in musical circles there is much interest in the concert to be given at the Garrick Theatre by Mrs. Ben Lathrop, who has achieved considerable success in her brief career as a professional singer. Mrs. Lathrop's program will consist of selections from the French, German, Italian and English, which show the great scope of this talented lyric soprano. She will first sing selections from the early Italian works of Montverde, Handel, and Jomelli. These will be followed by a German group by Bach, Liszt, and Wolf, and a "Love Song," sung in Swedish,—a piece composed by Berg expressly for Jenny Lind. The French numbers will be most charming,—two melodious old Seventh Century Carols, a "Romanze" by Debussy, and "Si j'avais vos ailes," by Messager, manager of the Paris Grand Opera. Among the English selections will be Luckstone's "Birth of the Opal," Gilberte's "There, little girl, don't cry," Moir's "When Celia sings," and a group of children's songs by Brainard. The noted Viennese violincello virtuoso, Karl Grienauer, and his wife, a talented pianist, will assist Mrs. Lathrop. With violincello obligato she will sing one of Brahm's most delightful "Gypsy Songs" arranged by Mr. Grienauer and a "Lullaby" by the Russian composer, Napravnik.

New Farce at Ye Liberty

Next week, commencing Monday evening, the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will offer the first stock presentation in the west of "Mrs. Temple's Telegram," a farce comedy with several record runs in the east to its credit. When it was first given at the Madison Square Theatre, New York, "Mrs. Temple's Telegram" ran for more than three hundred nights. A comedy to keep blase New Yorkers amused for this length of time must certainly have exceptional merit. The story is that of a married man, who, having been caught high in the air by a Ferris Wheel, the machinery of which has broken, and having been compelled to spend the night poised in mid air, endeavors to placate his wife by telling her the truth the next morning, but being laughed at by her, is forced to resort to a lie. It is this apparently innocent subterfuge that involves the husband, wife and friends in all sorts of complications which keeps the audience in continual laughter. In short, "Mrs. Temple's Telegram" is a farce filled with clean, wholesome fun, generously supplied with abundant cause for laughter, and yet not wanting in that cleverness which appeals to the intelligence and taste of the auditor. The cast, although not a long one, will give all the Liberty favorites splendid opportunities and will include Helene Lackaye, Katharine Mulkins, Georgie Cooper, Lillian Elliott, Landers Stevens, George Friend, Henry Shumer, E. L. Bennison and George Webster. "Alabama," Augustus Thomas's greatest drama, is announced to followd.

A Big Benefit for Actors' Fund

The big theatrical event of the season will take place at the Princess Theatre Tuesday afternoon, May 4, when the eighth benefit in aid of the Charity Fund of the Associated Theatrical Managers of San Francisco will be given. Before the fire these benefits were given annually, and, on account of the deserving character of the cause and the splendid program invariably offered standing room was always at a premium. Since the fire, however, the managers have rested on their oars but of late the calls for relief from unfortunate members of the profession have been so many that the treasury has been depleted and they now have determined to call upon the always generous San Francisco public for assistance. Not that every one who purchases a ticket will not receive his full money's worth and "then some." A program is in course of preparation that will excel anything ever offered in the city and the best features from the current bills at the Van Ness, Alcazar, Princess, Valencia, Orpheum and American Theatres will be presented. The entertainment will be started with a lively first part by I. P. Wilkerson's "Minstrels of Today," from the American, and there will follow in rapid succession acts of a most varied and meritorious kind. Mme. Nazimova and her company will assist, the Alcazar and Valencia stock companies will contribute acts from plays, the Princess will give something from "A Chinese Honeymoon," and the Orpheum and members of the American Musical Comedy Company will contribute some splendid vaudeville acts. The overture will be played by the combined orchestras of the city and the performance will, as usual, be continuous. The price of seats will be reduced to a dollar and a half instead of two dollars as hitherto.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The program at the Orpheum for next week will have for its chief novel feature Lillian Mortimer, an exceptionally talented actress who will present a play of her writing, entitled "Po White Trash Jinny," which affords her an excellent opportunity to excel in the name part. The Four Sisters Amatis will present a unique musical offering. Cisela, one of the sisters is said to be the possessor of the widest range in the world, covering three and a half octaves and extending to B over high C or to be more technical B Altizzimo. The Four Sisters play on different pianos at the same time classical and popular selections. Knight Brothers and Lillian Sawtelle will contribute an eccentric singing and dancing act which has proved an enormous hit elsewhere. Next week will be the second of Grigolati's Aerial Ballet and their latest flying novelty Butterflies and Doves. It will be the last of Margaret Moffat and Company, in "Awake at the Switch," Paul Sandor's Miniature Circus, Arcadia and Frank Fogarty in his humorous observations.

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

Written exclusively for Town Talk by J. M. JACOBI

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

We will also start a query column, in which the reader may ask questions pertaining to dress. Such questions will be answered in the following issue.

SUMMER AND OUTING SHIRTS

The soft fabrics, flannels, silks and mixtures will be more in evidence the coming summer than ever before. From the standpoint of men of modest means, they are economical even though the first outlay is above the average, for the simple reason that they may be laundered at home. Patterns and color effects in these are prettier than formerly. Pleated or plain shirts are ever popular in spring and summer, the pleated shirt being the more favored of the two in soft fabrics. The cuff should always be turned back or rolling.

OUTING SUITS, NORFOLK JACKETS, BREECHES AND KNICKERBOCKERS FOR COUNTRY USE

For the sea shore a blue coat, vest and white flannel trouser either plain or striped. This outfit can also be used for the tennis court. The proper suit for general country wear is the Norfolk suit and it is without doubt the only fancy suit, which can be worn without appearing grotesque or freakish. The pleats of the garment may vary from season to season, or it may have a yoke or be without it. The Norfolk always was and will be a gentleman's outing coat. Occasions make it necessary to change the costume suitable for riding or walking, golfing or fishing. The change is effected by changing the trousers suitable for walking, into breeches suitable for riding, or into knickerbockers suitable for golf. Illustration of which is found above.

Striped Knickerbockers

Striped "Norfolk" Coat

In the Limelight

Otis Skinner's engagement at the Van Ness Theatre in "The Honor of the Family" will come to a close this Saturday evening. The performance is a positive triumph.

Nat C. Goodwin's role in the new play called "A Native Son" is that of an energetic Californian. Goodwin and Edna Goodrich are now appearing as co-star, the bill boards announcing "America's Greatest Comedian, Mr. Nat. C. Goodwin and most beautiful actress, Miss Edna Goodrich.

When "A Texas Steer," which will follow "If I Were King" at the Valencia Theatre was first produced at the California Theatre in this city, Congressman Julius Kahn, then an actor of no mean ability, played "Brassy Gall." Tim Murphy played "Maverick Brander" and pretty little Flora Walsh, Charles Hoyt's first wife, was "Bossy." In the coming Valencia production Paul McAllister and Florence Oakley will play the two last roles.

And suppose that Pincus should manage to get rid of Chief Cook and succeed in landing that meddlesome newspaperman in the county jail? Suppose Chief Cook, for instance, should go out on the bay in the municipal launch some night and never come back—such things, incredible as they may seem to the Bulletin, have happened— Chief of Police Biggy, I recall, went out in the municipal launch one night, and he never came back; they say he fell overboard and was accidentally drowned, or that he committed suicide, or—but why speculate on what really happened to Chief of Police Biggy? Let us rather guess what may happen to Chief of Police Cook if he doesn't watch out. Anyway it will be the safer course if he does not go out in the municipal launch at night. He might fall overboard and drown; or he might commit suicide; or—something fatal might happen to him.

Then, with a friend of Pincus in the office of Chief of Police—Tom Magee wouldn't be a bad man for the place—and that interloping newspaperman cooped up in a dark cell of the county jail, what is to prevent the establishment of that "municipal crib?" And what a rich rake-off there would be for all concerned!

I was going to reiterate my inquiry as to what the decent citizens of San Francisco would think of a program like that but on second thought I refrain. There is no need to ask what the decent citizens would think. It wouldn't matter the worth of a League of Justice button what the decent citizens of San Francisco would think. The decent citizens of San Francisco are not asked for their opinion on any subject of this sort. It wouldn't be heeded anyway. What does William J. Burns, and Charles Oliver, and Pincus, and Tom Magee, and Korngold, and Schindler, and Russell, care for the opinion of decent citizens either in rebuke or commendation?

Ethel Barrymore will be here next month with her brilliantly successful production of "Lady Frederick."

The Valencia Theatre management has secured for early production a most important play in "The Traitor," by Thomas Dixon Jr. No drama of recent years has caused so much discussion as this and wherever it has been produced in the east it has created a profound sensation. It is a story of the Ku-Klux Klan of the Reconstruction period and is absorbing in its interest, one of the striking scenes being a trial by jury in which eleven of the twelve jurymen are negroes.

THE CHARACTER OF YOUR CAR

Depends largely upon its makers. The owner of a STUDEBAKER-GARFORD is its staunchest friend, because he knows that every detail of his machine has been made from the finest material and with the greatest mechanical skill—that, sixty years of experience in carriage building has enabled the Studebaker concern to put out a machine, which, in its entirety, represents the highest type of automobile efficiency. These qualities have reached their highest development in the Models "C" and "D" of the STUDEBAKER-GARFORDS.

AMERICA'S THREE LEADING AUTOMOBILES

Auto Notes

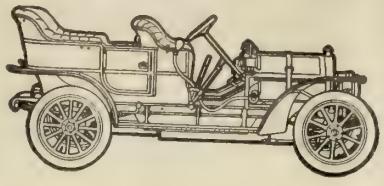
Like 85 per cent of all the motorists who have crossed the United States in their cars, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Littlefield, who will leave Oakland shortly for a trip around the border of the United States, have equipped their car with Diamond Mountain Tread tires and Marsh rims.

John La Rue, one of the most prominent capitalists of the San Joaquin Valley, recently joined the ranks of motorists by purchasing a new Studebaker-Garford "thirty."

With the opening of the season of summer travel the various stage lines which have substituted automobiles for horse drawn vehicles, are beginning to get their cars into shape for the strenuous work required of them. From the long line operated by the Overland Company, from Sherwood to Pepperwood which operates Thomas Flyers exclusively, to the short lines used by real estate men demands are pouring in for more cars. The Overland route over the roughest roads of Mendocino and Humboldt is a severe test on cars, and the agents of the Thomas are naturally elated by the fact that their machine has proven its worth so conclusively that the stage company will use nothing else over its line. A better known, but less strenuous stage route is the line over the Pieta Grade into Lake County. Here also the Thomas has proven its adaptability for exacting road work. Numerous other stage lines have ordered Thomas cars for their service, to be delivered as soon as the roads are open.

The Pioneer Automobile Company reports the following sales: Dr. H. D. Raynard, Oakland, Chalmers-Detroit "30"; S. M. Phillips, Sacramento, Chalmers-Detroit "30"; R. A. Lewis, Loyalton, Model "D" Oldsmobile; H. E. Lewis, Loyalton, Chalmers-Detroit "30"; R. A. Lawson, Woodland, Chalmers-Detroit "30"; John Tuft, Fresno, Chalmers-Detroit "30."

The Studebaker Bros. have put out the first gasoline automobile ambulance ever seen on this coast. It is a handsome affair and has been sold to C. A. King of this city who will use it in a local automobile service.



Dr. Wright of Oakland went down to Santa Cruz last Sunday and reports the roads between here and Gilroy to be in fine condition, but beyond that point they are almost impassable on account of land slides and neglect. At San Juan he was informed by machines coming northward that the San Juan grade was closed, so he directed his Thomas Flyer over the Summit via the Rock Road to Santa Cruz. This stretch is very rough but is the only unpleasant bit of going to the Surf City.

The Thomas New York-Seattle pathfinder is now ploughing its way through the snows of the Wyoming Rockies. While trains were stalled in Colorado by the terrific blizzard prevailing there last week, the famous round the world car kept plugging ahead. Its shortest day's run was made the day before. Denver was reached with ninety miles recorded on the roadometer. Near Cheyenne and Laramie it is expected that the pathfinder will find its worst roads as it did during the "Round the World Race." It is a most wonderful test for a machine, one in fact that very few manufacturers would have the courage to require a machine to attempt, after having gone through such a grueling grind, as in the New York-Paris race, and makes the Glidden Tour pale into insignificance. The successful completion of this trip will make a period in automobile construction which almost spells perfection.

Chester N. Weaver, manager of Studebaker Bros. who a few days ago made a non-stop run to Cloverdale in his Studebaker "forty" says that the subject of improved highways in the north-of-the-bay counties has assumed a noteworthy aspect. Of late several meetings have been held by the Sonoma County Automobile Association which have resulted in the launching of an active campaign for the improvement of the roads from the bay to Lake County.

Lee Counselman, General Sales Manager of the Chalmers-Detroit Motor Company, arrived in San Francisco Saturday, after an extended trip throughout the west and northwest. In company with a party of friends, he took the trip around the bay Sunday and being interviewed in the evening, expressed himself as delighted with California. "Like others," said he, "I have made the mistake of traveling in foreign countries before covering what now seems to me the most attractive, most prosperous and most promising portion of our own country. Over two hundred thousand people go abroad yearly and their interest must be centered entirely in past history, because it is an old country. California is different, everything is new—I mean new to the easterner—and you are not losing your time figuring on things in the past. For the future, California offers more chances and furnishes more data to figure over than any country I have ever visited."

QUESTION—Why do all agents compare their automobiles to the Thomas?

Our answer—We are the only ones in our native land that had faith enough in our car to run it around the world.

A BIG TIP, $3,500,000.00—If everybody used a Thomas there would be no necessity of spending $3,500,000 for good roads.

All roads are good for a Thomas. Does anybody believe the roads are paved from New York to Paris? If so, try it.

My First Romance

child continued to laugh, the tears of the mother flowed and the man of death looked at them both without a word.

"Well," he said suddenly, turning toward his companions, "I do not see anything wrong in leaving Citizeness ——— here for a few days—till the child is weaned, perhaps."

"But," said the commissary, "everything in this house has been seized in the name of the law and everything will be sold."

"Pshaw!" replied Fouquier-Tinville. "Citizeness ——— can buy back her bed and the child's cradle; that is all that is necessary."

"But if she has no money?"

"She is pretty enough to find somebody who will lend it to her," he replied, doubtless trying to mask under this brutality the sympathy which was gaing possession of him. The sympathy of Fouquier-Tinville!

He turned his back and dragged the others away, while Madame de——— fell on her knees and thanked God as she pressed the child to her breast, the child who had saved her life.

Can you find in antiquity many evidences of maternal love that can be compared to that? I can tell you now the name of that woman; she was my mother, and it was I who, still in swaddling-clothes, snatched her from the guillotine. I had a good appetite and milk was so dear that she had to put off weaning me till summer. What an impulse of humanity, in the heart of a tiger, had commenced, was completed by circumstances; the Revolution of the ninth Thermidor came, and with it the last day of the Terror; my mother no longer had to fear that someone would come and order her to prepare for death on the pretext that I had reached an age when I could live without her.

HOW TO OBTAIN GOVERNMENT TIMBER OR AGRICULTURAL LANDS

Without Having to Live on the Land a Day

The average individual thinks that the only way to get title to Government Lands is make a homestead entry and live on same five years before getting a title. He is of the opinion he is limited to 160 acres and he would not live on a tract of land five years if the Government would deed him over one-half of a state. There is a way for any citizen of the United States to obtain title to any Government timber or agricultural land in any state in the Union without residence or cultivation. The only way to do this is to buy U. S. Government Land certificates and pay for your land with same. Railroads and timbermen obtain title to Government Land in this way.

The Government discontinued issuing these certificates about the year 1883 therefore they are getting very scarce. The firm of H. B. Sanders and Co., Judge Building, Salt Lake City, Utah, have secured a few thousand acres of them that they are offering at the rate of $25.00 per acre. The certificates come in 80 and 120 acre pieces, and can be located on any timber or agricultural land in Alaska or any state in the Union. Each piece has a letter of approval attached to it from the Government, and there is no limit to the time in which to locate them. According to the official report of the Department of Interior under date of July 1, 1908, there is still over 75 million acres of unappropriated land in Oregon, Washington, California and Idaho. Some of the finest timber land in the world is open for entry in these states. Any person wishing to get title to some timber land or anticipating starting a townsite in the west can get full particulars by writing the above firm.

Muir's Dog Story

After the innumerable caravan of more or less humanized dogs, credited with faith, hope and charity, to say nothing of intelligence and reasoning powers, will, memory and understanding, John Muir's "Stickeen" comes as a positive relief. For Stickeen was "just dog," of no known breed or pedigree and with no traits or characteristics by which even an approximate guess might be made in placing him. He was a self-reliant, independent little beast belonging to one of the exploring party which studied the glaciers of southeastern Alaska, and though he was by no means a welcome addition to the outfit, being apparently too small and weak to take care of himself and only an additional burden to the others, he proved himself a valliant little comrade, especially on one long day when he persisted in following Mr. Muir and sharing all the hardships of a stormy day on the ice and a narrow escape from disaster. After reading the sugared sweetness of the average dog stories especially those written by women, it is good to encounter the tonic wholesomeness of Stickeen and the sane depiction which Mr. Muir has given us. He was essentially a man's dog, despite his diminutive proportions, and he faced life as a man or a man's dog should. Then he disappeared—stolen—but he needs no tombstone in a canine cemetery, for no one who reads "Stickeen" will be apt to forget him. He was a good dog for his inches and he deserved the tribute of this little booklet. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Another "Kid Book"

Since John Habberton started the ball with "Helen's Babies," we have had the infant terrible served up to us with so many sauces and garnishments that the "kid book" has become almost as great a terror as the infants themselves. However, there is something new under the sun, and Mrs. Calhoun has discovered it. It would be hard to say whether Aunt Minerva or William Green Hill is most to be compassionated, for a worse assorted couple it would be hard to find. Billy had spent the first six years of a care free existence on a plantation where, his mother being dead, his indifferent father was something less than a negligible quantity, he lived a healthy, natural life under the perfunctory oversight of Aunt Cindy, and enjoyed every moment of his existence. Then his father died and Billy was transferred to the guardianship of his Aunt Minerva. She was a dyed-in-the-wool old maid who did not like children under any circumstances, and had a special antipathy to boys in general and her nephew in particular, for she had never forgiven her sister for marrying. Billy found himself transformed in an instant. Not only was he to live in a town and learn town ways, but he was to be henceforth William Green Hill. Worse than that, Aunt Minerva conceived the idea of bringing him up in gentle ways, teaching him to play with a doll, to make clothes for the puppet and to sweep, cook, and otherwise comport himself in proper fashion, and eventually to become a minister of the gospel. Billy's formal education had been beautifully neglected, and Aunt Minerva's first interview was a foretaste of what was to come, for though Billy had never been to Sunday school he had attended "pertracted" meeting, and could give the history of "Sanctified Sophy's" getting "erligion." He could repeat the childish "Now I lay me" with devotion, but he added thereto a petition for protection against "hants," witches and other negro terrors, and he had more faith in the efficacy of his hind foot of a rabbit than he had in the prayers. His vocabulary and intonation were plain "nigger" and he had the most astonishing conglomeration of precocious misinformation, superstition and bland ignorance that any one could expect to encounter, and nearly raised the hair of his good aunt's head when he enlightened her with regard to the numerous family of Aunt Blue Gum Tempy's Peruny Pearline and their paternity. But Billy really was not a bad little chap, nor even a hard case. Any one would prefer him to his neighbor, Jimmy, for Billy never tried to lay the blame of his misdeeds on any one else, and indeed most of the scrapes he managed to get into were the results of Aunt Minerva's efforts to transform an extremely masculine little boy into a prim girl. Jimmy and Billy found able assistants in their two little girl friends, Frances and Lina, and the efforts of the girls to have a good time and still keep within the bounds of gentility which their mothers demanded are often comical enough. There is one great merit about this simple little story. Frances Boyd Calhoun has kept the elders in the background, and when Billy and Jimmy have "broken" rules and Frances and Lina have earned their punishment, they are not presented before the parental court with arguments by which to defeat their judges. Billy goes to bed in the daytime without proving to Miss Minerva that she is a tyrannical ogre, and Frances takes her place in the closet under the stairs, while Lina sits down to her page of the catechism, quite as a matter of course. Jimmy's mother alternates between spankings for his misdeeds and promise of payment for perfection, but after all a certain amount of indiscretion is inevitable to childhood. One has reason to be thankful when their pranks and investigations are not actuated by vice or meanness, and the children who could be "good" after the copybook formula would be either too stupid or too sick to be anything else. There is such a condition as being so good as to be good for nothing. How William Green Hill was retransformed into plain Billy, and how Aunt Minerva was finally induced to forego her designs on his masculinity bring the story to a fitting end. ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Psychologist—(1) Yes, it was something of a coincidence that immediately after Judge Murasky took the contempt case under advisement, his cousin should have been summoned as a juror in Judge Lawlor's court there to make known the fact that he was an appraiser for the United Railroads. (2) Yes, I believe it was possible to have any man summoned whose presence was desired. (3) I doubt that it was done for the purpose you mention. It might be dangerous to employ such means of intimidation, and yet we know that the courts have been intimated and that diverse means of intimidation have been employed. Not all judges, however, will tamely submit to such methods.

Constant Reader—No, the full report made by Commissioner Kyle to Mayor Taylor with reference to Chief Biggy's death has never been published. Yes, immediately after Biggy's death his private papers were seized by men in sympathy with the G. P.

Philanthropist—No, Reuben Lloyd did not leave anything to Golden Gate Park. I don't know why he didn't.

Old Resident—Yes, the rents on the ground floor of the Phelan building are the highest in town. Yes, Mr. Phelan is a public spirited citizen, the most public spirited citizen that we have. He is constantly trying to safeguard the people from the greed of corporations. He has no prejudice against the rapacity of landlords.

THE BABY'S SMILE

A sunbeam stole through an open door,
It silently crept along
Making its way o'er the carpetless floor
While a baby was lisping a song.

It wearily tarried and lingered awhile,
Then silently it withdrew,
For the baby's smile and the baby's song
Left naught for the sunbeam to do.

HIS SALVATION

Bilter—You came near losing your life during your recent illness, didn't you?

Caterby—Yes; I tell you, old fellow, if I hadn't had women physicians, it would have been all up with me.

Bilter—What! you had women physicians?

Caterby—Yes, and while they were holding a consultation over me I got well

SYMPTOMATIC

Doctor (feeling patient's pulse)—How long have you been suffering with this terrible thirst?

The Muckrakers' Pet Project

From the New York Evening Post we learn that "there are ominous stories afloat about a coalition of magazines and weeklies to muck-rake the Taft Administration" in furtherance of a scheme to prepare the way for the election of Theodore Roosevelt in 1912. It is not at all improbable that this project has been formed. Indeed, have we not heard the keynote sounded? Alfred Henry Lewis, a journalist of the Hapgood-Steffens type, has been expressing in the Hearst papers the profoundest dissatisfaction with the Taft Administration, frequently insinuating that the Wall Street Money Devil is in control of the works. Mr. Hearst himself has taken occasion to assert that all the virtue there is in the Republican party has gone to Africa. There is no community of sentiment between Mr. Taft and the muckrakers, and it is natural that these passionate demagogues of the press, these half-baked philosophers, these stentorian moralists of journalism, who have enjoyed the co-operation of the Chief Magistrate of the country for several years, deriving from this hallowed authority verisimilitude for bold and unconvincing libels, should be very much dissatisfied with the present dispensation which offers them neither encouragement nor recognition.

A Prodigious Feat

In all probability the Taft Administration is doomed to be muckraked fore and aft. The muckrakers have a strong organization combining great resources of publicity with most flexible activity. They are skilled in the art of exciting fanatical zeal and they pursue their pernicious designs with considerable intellectual cunning. But while they may succeed in inflaming sentiment against Mr. Taft and members of his official family they are not likely to succeed in putting Mr. Roosevelt back on the pedestal which he so long occupied. With Mr. Roosevelt in the role of plain citizen, divested of the halo of office, and with the evidence constantly accumulating of the perfidies, the crimes, the shams and the falsehoods of his public career, long before 1912 it will appear that to reinstate him in the esteem of his former worshipers is a task too prodigious for even the most industrious and talented molders of public opinion. It was but the other day that we were told that under instructions from the Attorney-General of the United States the so-called land fraud cases against Governor Haskell of Oklahoma and six of his townsmen were wholly abandoned by the government prosecutors. The Springfield Republican, a sober, conservative journal, the respectability nor the truthfulness, of which was ever questioned commenting on these cases, says that the charge that the indictments "were originally obtained solely for political effect by officials acting under instructions from Washington may have substance." And the Republican adds, "Such indictments have been secured in other cases, notably that of Senator Borah of Idaho, in order to wreak vengeance on the persons accused; and it is certain that the circumstances under which Governor Haskell was indicted are now shown to have been suspicious in their bearing." It is this sort of startling news respecting the last Administration, which gradually is enabling a long-deluded public to put a proper estimate on the scheming politician and moral idiot who, until recently, held sway over the hearts of his countrymen.

Why They Take Off Their Hats

The women of the Palo Alto Presbyterean Church have agreed to discard their hats while attending divine worship. It is a pleasing innovation but there does not appear to be any reason for it. It is an ancient jest that women do not reason; but the sarcasm is neither smart nor true. These women of Palo Alto were certainly moved to their action by something more than mere feminine whim or impulse. Yet no reason is given. When the agitation for the removal of women's hats in the theatres was in progress reasons for the new fashion were plentiful as blackberries; but the chief objection to the theatre hat was in the universal complaint of men patrons of the theatre that the hats of women obstructed the view of the stage. This objection cannot be urged against the church hat. Only in exceptional circumstances is it at all advisable that the hat's of the feminine congregation shall be removed during the services. If the preacher is young, good looking and unmarried; and if a large portion of the congregation is composed of young, good looking and unmarried women, it might be almost necessary that the preacher should be at all times in plain view of the assemblage. Women have covered their heads in the sanctuary ever since the fashion of women's hats was invented; and before that time women knelt at shrines wearing mantillas or sat in the tabernacles shrouded in veils that covered the head and the face. It has never been urged against feminine head gear that its presence at the altar was sacrilegious or even disrespectful; or that it was an offense in the eyes of the Lord. Women have been prohibited from speaking in the presence of the congregation, and Paul was especially earnest in protest against display of jewels and ornaments of feminine adornment in gold and silver and tinkling brass; but nowhere in the records and scriptures of the primitive Christian church is there a hint of inhibition of women's head gear or coiffure while at their devotions. There is a reason, however, and a good one for the action of the women of the Palo Alto congregation. The latest fashion in women's hats is so grotesque that it concentrates the bulk of attention of every member of every congregation spiritual or secular. Nothing dominates the new-fashioned hat of modern woman. No preaching however eloquent can hold a congregation against the whimsical appeal of the queer hats the women are now wearing. They must be an offense in the eyes of men and women of good taste and artistic sensibilities. Objection has been frequently uttered against costly and superlatively beautiful bonnets in church, on the plea that they distract the attention of envious women from the discourse of the preacher and that they incite the sin of covetousness in the hearts of those women whose hats are not so costly nor so beautiful. Envy and covetousness, however, are venial sins; they may be eradicated from the hearts of women. But when the vanity of woman reaches the stage of the fantastic and the grotesque there is no hope for her while the fashion lasts; and even in the sanctuary she is still under the unholy spell of the evil genius that invented this latest fashion in women's hats. It is very probable, therefore, that the women of that Palo Alto congregation have discarded their hats in church because they realize that it is indeed a sacrilege to bring ridicule or that which is ridiculous into the house of the Lord.

Faithless Clerics

Rev. W. E. Vaughan, addressing an assemblage of Methodist ministers in Atlanta, Georgia, informed them that there are seven thousand college students in California and not enough religion among them to save rat. A remarkable state of affairs, it might be supposed, in view of the fact that our two leading universities are presided over by clerical gentlemen. And yet from our viewpoint it is not at all remarkable, for, considering the trend of thought in the pulpit today, it is not unreasonable to look for irreligion wherever ministers of the jarring sects are in authority. Our so-called theologians have done much toward creating indifference to religion by their teaching as well as by the atmosphere which they have introduced in the temples of worship. Our churches like our colleges have been steadily degenerating under the influence of the superficially educated. Our college professors and our city divines are proud these days of being unorthodox. It has become fashionable among our culturined philosophers to turn the back on dogmas and creeds. Church formularies have come to be regarded as an incubus on true religious thought and feeling. There are many clergymen who rest their religious persuasions chiefly on sentiment, and from contact with them the uneducated herd have derived the impression that dogma has been abandoned by all persons of education and is properly to be regarded as a superstition. The irreligion that prevails is largely the result of a defective religious instinct in the pulpit, where absurd efforts are being made by small minds to harmonize Christianity with modern ideas. Instead of attributing the lack of religious feeling and religious zeal to the perversity of human nature the clerical gentlemen should place the blame where it belongs—on their own shoulders—and amend their ways. There was a time when ministers commanded and induced respect for religion. In that day and generation to be a minister of the gospel was to occupy a front rank in the community. Religion entered into every day affairs. Every school commencement, corner stone ceremonial and public meeting was begun with prayer, and little boys doffed caps and little girls dropped "curcheys" at the sight of whatever resembled a clerical garb. Special rates and prices were made for "the cloth," and in every possible way not only religion but its representatives received due deference. The families that did not attend church services were looked upon as little better than outcasts, and it was assumed, as a matter of course, that the Sabbath school was a feeder to the congregation. Then came the sensational and the spectacular preacher, proud of his familiarity with subjects of popular interest and his ability to expound them. The pulpit began to borrow the complexion of the yellow magazines. Sacred concerts were substituted for Sunday evening services. Preachers appeared in the pulpit in bicycle togs. Occasionally they impersonated biblical characters in fancy costume. They advocated church saloons, courting parlors and other holy dissipations. Thus did the preachers convert houses of worship into Thalian temples and lower the services of Christian creeds to the level of cheap vaudeville. And all the while at ministerial conventions the reverend gentlemen tore their creeds to tatters and made it apparent to all that the shepherds appointed to direct the flocks were often incompetent and not infrequently treacherous.

Demoralization in France

It has been said that while philosophy may provide for the material wants of mankind religion alone can be counted on to satisfy the spiritual. While this is quite true it is a mistake to suppose that religion is conducive to nothing but spiritual comfort. Many wise statesmen have voiced the opinion that no nation can afford to banish religion; that religious feeling is as essential to the life of a nation as government itself. The probability is that the experience of France will exemplify this theory. Contempt for religion has become one of the leading characteristics of French statesmen and France appears to be drifting into anarchy. This we learn on the testimony of Mr. Alvan F. Sanborn, a Protestant in religion, who is contributing to the Boston Traveler a series of papers on the results of the separation of Church and State in France. He has lived long in France and is a prolific writer on French sociological and literary subjects. The French themselves, he tells us, are becoming alarmed at the increase in crime. Its causes, he says, are easily traceable in great part to the lessening of religious restraints. According to the official reports of the Minister of Justice there has been an increase of eighty per cent in the total number of crimes since 1901. If the last five years alone are considered the criminal statistics are even more appalling. Mr. Sanborn quotes the eminent scientist and sociologist, Dr. Gustave Lebon, to the effect that criminality has augmented in proportions that are veritably terrifying.

It has doubled, says Dr. Lebon, in five years. Paris and even the small towns are infested with gangs of thugs, and thirty per cent of the crimes that are committed are murders. This alarming state of affairs, attributed by Mr. Sanborn to the lack of religious instruction, by others to the prevalence of atheistic sentiment, is unparalleled in the history of modern times. All France, we are told, has been demoralized by the anticlerical movement. The bigoted politicians, not satisfied with separating Church and State, a consummation that was for the good of all concerned, waged a bitter war against all representatives of the church, confiscated church property and drove teachers of religion out of the country. Now Socialism is more aggressive than ever and sadly have the refining influences of religion been missed. Even the hospitals, formerly conducted by nuns are now a disgrace to humanity, the sick being subjected to the most brutal treatment. The anticlerical movement has had a disastrous effect also on agriculture and on the industrial arts. The churchmen of France were the first to appreciate the magnificent results that might be obtained by applying the discoveries of science to farming. They established farm schools and in the World's Fair of 1900 the jury which passed judgment on the institutions for the development of the working people awarded the greater part of the prizes to Catholic establishments. The schools have been closed. "It would not be easy," says Mr. Sanborn, "to discover an example of greater folly in the history of modern peoples." And now dissatisfaction is making itself felt in all parts of the country, and Paris is once more in a state of ferment. Perhaps those writers that lamented the stubbornness of the Pope, and pointed out the great loss that his policy was bound to bring upon the church will learn in time that he was just a little more farsighted than the statesmen of France. Perhaps he knew that in the long run the inevitable reaction from irreligion would prove to the advantage of the institution whose destinies he is guiding. France may yet be glad to restore stolen church property.

Mayor Taylor says he doesn't think the people should expect him to run again. They don't.

The women employed in the government service at Washington are indignant because the National Civic Federation of women appointed a committee to investigate their private conduct. Why shouldn't the government clerks retaliate by employing spies to investigate the private conduct of the ladies of the Civic Federation? It's a game doctor that takes his own medicine.

President David Starr Jordan has been drawing a picture of what the world would be without war. It's something, we suppose, like a picture of the Palo Alto University without Professor Clark.

The sanest suggestion that has been made in many a moon is that we should elect Gavin McNab Mayor of the city. But it would be better still to adopt the Galveston plan with McNab as a committee of one.

The Turks and Their Capital

By Arthur Swan

It appears from the despatches that the crafty Sultan Abdul Hamid, commander of the faithful, has been unfaithful once too often. A little less than a year ago he agreed to revive the Constitution of his country, but nobody in Europe had any faith in his promises. When the Sultan yielded to the young Turks European statesmen said that he was merely reproducing the constitutional comedy of 1876, and their judgment has been vindicated. The government of Turkey has been in a pretty bad state for many years. Control of public office long since passed from the Sublime Porte were the ministers had become figureheads into the hands of the favorites at Yildiz Kiosk. Public office was used to reward intriguers, given to men possessed of all the vices of the old type and no capacity for administration. Hardly less fruitful of discontent was the almost incredible bungling of everything connected with finance. Public funds were absorbed by eunuchs and courtiers or was spent upon ships of war that lay rotting in the Golden Horn or upon armies of spies swarming in Constantinople. The agitation of the Young Turks was fed by the dissatisfaction and discontent of the people. And all the while every Turk ran the risk of exile or ruin for any word that could be twisted into evidence of disaffection. It was not long ago that a schoolboy was banished from Constantinople for giving a light for a cigarette to one who turned out to be a servant of the heir to the throne who has been kept a prisoner in close confinement and with whom it was treason to have any intercourse. The encouragement given to informers produced a class of blackmailers who lived and flourished by threatening to make trouble at Yildiz Kiosk.. It is a well known fact that there are districts where the whole of the effendi or gentlemen class is composed of men expelled from Constantinople on account of their liberal opinions.

Notwithstanding the cruel despotism that has prevailed in Constantinople, for visiting foreigners it possessed many charms. The seat of the glorious Byzantine Empire still retains much of the old atmosphere. There is of course a greater confusion of races, but this circumstance in itself has a singular charm. In Constantinople there is much of novelty. You may go direct from prisons to palaces, from cafes chantant to the chanting of the Koran in Moslem mosques. You may gaze on the whirling of the white skirts of the dancing dervishes in the afternoon and watch snowy petticoats beneath Doucet gowns swirling in the waltzes of an embassy ball in the evening. If you prefer the danse du ventre you may see that executed by Persian danseuses in the questionably respectable quarters of lower Galata. It is in Galata that the European official find his home. Pera is another section of the town occupied by Europeans. It is here along the Bosphorus the embassies have their winter palaces. In this city of palaces, for whose decoration and adornment the entire known world was laid under contribution—Carthage, Baghdad, Damascus, Rome itself being despoiled—within this wondrous city three puissant personalities still fill all its stage. Wherever the mental eye roves, whether it be fixed in the Chake, the world-famous vestibule of the chief palace, whose walls were tapestried with mosaics and marbles, or whether we strive to reconstruct the glory of those splendors of the Consistorion, or whether we move toward the terraces overhanging the blues of the Marmora, we may even yet trace behind the mosque of Sultan Achmet, Justinian's plebeian, yet masterful face, Theodora's perfectly modeled figure, and Belisarius, the brave, the mighty savior-general of Rome.

Heliographing Mars

Some Suggestions of Apparently Insuperable Difficulties Attendant Upon the Proposed $10,000,000 Scheme to Communicate With the Red Planet, and a Few Questions Which the Eminent Scientists Ought to Answer Before We Pay the Money.

By Democritus

An eminent scientist informs us that for the pitiful sum of $10,000,000 we may "communicate with Mars." A mere bagatelle, to be sure; contributed by John D. Rockefeller it wouldn't be a drop in a bucket of oil. But why communicate with Mars? What have we to learn from our sister satellite that we do not already know or may know if we desire the knowledge? Oh, yes; about those "canals." In the first place we would like to know if they are really what we have guessed them to be; and if they are what our eminent scientists have told us they are, we want to know how they were constructed and for what purpose. It is pertinent to inquire, however, if the information will be worth the price. Suppose the Martians should flash back an answer to our question announcing that there are no canals in Mars; that the streaks we have observed on the surface of the planet are merely rights of way for transcontinental railroads or something equally commonplace? Is it worth $10,000,000 to discredit the science of those eminent astronomers, Professor Edgar Larkin and Professor Garrett P. Serviss? Certainly not. Those eminent scientists can be discredited for thirty cents.

Furthermore, even if the streaks are canals, what good will the confirmation of our suspicions do? Don't we know nearly all that is worth knowing about canals? And when we have completed the Panama Canal will Mars be able to tell us anything about canals that we will care to pay $10,000,000 to know? Our canal has already cost us many times $10,000,000 and it is not estimated even by the most economical of our canal builders that the big ditch will cost us less than five times $10,000,000 before we begin to charge tolls for its use. Then why should we pay the eminent scientists $10,000,000 to find out how much it costs to build canals in Mars? We are in the habit of wasting a lot of money at home on this earth of ours without throwing it out into space on the chance that its equivalent will return to us after many days in a "communication" informing us that the canals of Mars are either "lock" affairs or on "sea level."

I suppose the method of "communication" will be on the heliograph plan. A mirror about the size of Texas will probably be constructed and when it is noonday here and midnight in Mars we shall manipulate the big glass so as to throw a reflection of our sunlight into the night life of the neighboring planet. We shall do this every day until the regularity of our signal attracts the attention of the Martians. It is presumed that the inhabitants of Mars are much more intelligent than we are and that it will not take them long to understand that we are trying to "communicate" with them. Let me say in passing that this presumption of the superior intelligence of the Martians is based on the statements of eminent scientists to the effect that Mars is approximately 30,000,000 years older than our earth and that, therefore, according to the deductions and conclusions of eminent scientific logicians, the Martians are about 15,000,000 years farther advanced in intelligence than we are. There is nothing in human possibility more plausible than the statements of our eminent scientists.

But let us return to our inter-stellar heliographic hypothesis. We have established our heliograph and we have attracted the attention of the midnight Martians. We have excited the curiosity of that highly civilized and super-intellectual people. They will get out their biggest telescopes and look at us, seeking to discover the source of the sudden phenomenon. It is probable that none of the telescopes of Mars are provided with telescopic microscopes which would be necessary if the Martian observers would see Professor Larkin and Professor Serviss wig-wagging with that big looking-glass. The Martian scientists will be much mystified notwithstanding their superior intelligence; but presently they will observe that there is method in this apparent madness—that the flashes are at regular intervals and that some of them are more prolonged than others. This will inform the intelligent Martians that another if an inferior intelligence is endeavoring to communicate with them. It is the hope and belief of our eminent scientists that as soon as the Martians have arrived at this inevitable conclusion they will set about devising a method of answering our signals. The mere mechanical process of flashing signals from Mars to the earth will not long worry the Martians. In a very short time the return flashes will be visible from our observatory blinking like a revolving light on the Oregon coast.

Thus far I have followed the eminent scientists of earth and Mars; but I fail to see how we are to understand each other after we have established our heliographic communication. The Martians unquestionably speak a language that must be unintelligible to us; and our methods of transmitting thought and ideas must be the crudest gibberish to the Martians. We know how difficult it is to comprehend the monkey language; and it is fair to presume that the Martians would experience even great difficulty in understanding the thought and ideas of the earth people. Neither Professor Larkin nor Professor Serviss has as yet told us how we are going to understand what the Martians are saying to us or how the Martians will understand what we are saying to them. It is all very well to signal Mars and it is exceedingly satisfying to know that our signals are observed and answered; but what else do we get for our $10,000,000? If we can't understand Mars and if Mars can't understand us, what's the use of wasting $10,000,000, to say nothing of wasting Professor Larkin and Professor Serviss in such futile endeavor?

I don't want to throw cold water on this great enterprise, but I do want more information concerning the practical results of the experiment. If we are going to give these eminent scientists $10,000,000 for the purpose of establishing communication with Mars, we should first be informed what we will get for our money. Anyway we ought to know how we are going to overcome the difficulty I have suggested; namely, how are we who utter our thought going to communicate intelligently and intelligibly with a race of men so far superior to us that they do not utter their thought at all—beings who have passed the spoken language stage of human development and are in the thought transference period of their existence?

I await the further report of the eminent scientists who have this gigantic scheme in hand; and I advise my fellow capitalists to withhold their contributions to that $10,000,000 Mars communication fund until the learned savants throw a little more light on the subject.

Letters to an Absent Husband

(From the French of Marcel Prevost)

April 4th.

My Dearest! Oh, how dejected and miserable I am without you. You have been gone only two days, but I am so lonely and I look forward with great sadness to the twenty-seven days of your journey. How unreasonable is the government that separates a wife from her husband three months after their marriage. Why should you be with the infantry in Brest while I am here in Paris. Surely it is not required of a chief clerk of the Ministry to drill. It seems to me perfectly absurd. No wonder people dislike the Republic. You know the large chair which is in your study? Well, it is lonely, dearest, the large chair. It told me so yesterday; we talked together all the afternoon. I wanted to laugh and to weep when I looked at it. Your colleague Simon came to see me. You asked him, he says, to call upon me during your absence, to keep me company, and to tell me the gossip of the ministry so that I might write it you afterwards. He has been very kind; he is very well educated. But for me to hear someone else speak of the office and of the clerks as you do, it gave me a blow, and I began to weep. Poor Simon was at a loss to know what attitude to assume. I do not believe that he will return often. His first visit was not very pleasant for him. Adieu, my dearest, my beloved, your little wife kisses you very tenderly. She is going to bed to dream of her absent Jack.

—Charlotte.

P. S. I have received a letter from your mother. She tells me that she wishes to have you come and spend a week with her as soon as you are off duty. Ah! No, no, no!

April 12th. (A fragment.)

. . . . I try to overcome my sleeplessness by reading. But you know I do not care much for reading, it hurts my eyes, without causing me to sleep. And then when there are characters in the book who love each other I think of ourselves and weep. Your colleague Simon continues to come to see me. He comes now every other day. It gives me a great deal of pleasure to talk of you with him, but between ourselves, dearest, do you not think that these frequent visits to a young wife may be a little imprudent? Not for me certainly! The man who could make me forget my Jack is not yet born. But for him. He is a bachelor, he is young and I am not ugly you know. It seems to me that for some little time he has looked at me strangely. It would not be worth while for him to make himself unhappy on my account. Write me what it is best to do and I shall do it. —Charlotte.

P. S. I do not wish to say anything disagreeable to you, but really, dearest, your mother is unkind. What is there to prevent her from going to visit you at Brest? She could see you every day after parade.

April 16th. (A fragment.)

It is not nice of you to write me "that all women imagine that it is only necessary to see them in order to fall in love with them." I assure you that your colleague Simon is beginning to fall in love with me. It does not matter to me, you understand, but what is the use of allowing this boy to become infatuated? Would it not be better to tell him, very kindly, to discontinue his calls? However, just as you wish. My sleeplessness and nervous attacks continue. I no longer have any appetite, nothing tempts me. I am bored at home and nevertheless I can't decide to go out. Oh, return to me quickly, my dearest, my beloved! I need you near me. If you spent a week with your mother after your service on arriving in Paris, you would not find your little Charlotte. I should be dead, dead of grief. You know it is not necessary for you to go to your mother's. Promise me you will not. —Charlotte.

April 17th.

I beg you, if this note reaches you in time, give me permission to dismiss your colleague Simon. I hasten to tell you that he has never been impertinent with me, but truly, his eyes frighten me. I cannot help thinking that he is meditating something. I have the maid remain in the dining-room with the door ajar, now, when he is in the drawing-room with me.

—Your Charlotte.

April 22nd. (Fragment.)

. . . . There, it is understood, is it not? And you are no longer angry on account of my three days of silence? If you knew how unhappy I have been during those three days, my love! Oh! without any reason, believe me. It was the bad weather, it was I know not what. In short, I wept and wept, I could not decide to write you. Return quickly, dearest, we shall still be very happy together, what do you say? Write me in your next letter that we shall still be as happy as before your twenty-eight days? A thousand kisses from your

—Charlotte.

P. S. I have raised the maid's wages ten francs a month. You know we spoke of it together last month and she has shown herself very devoted since I have been alone with her. She is an excellent girl; I have done right, have I not?

April 27th. (Fragment.)

. . . . Another letter from your mother. The poor woman wishes absolutely to have you near her during a week to herself alone, "before dying," she says. Her letter has touched me truly. I have suffered so much on account of your absence that I understand that she suffers, she, who has not seen you for so long a time. Do the best you can, my dearest. I do not wish to have the remorse, if your mother should die, of having prevented you from embracing her. . . . I, well yes, are you satisfied? You were right, your colleague Simon was not in love with me. He has even confessed to me that he is about to marry!

May 4th. (Fragment.)

. . . . Besides I am much better. Now that I know that you are with your good mother, dearest, I feel easier, you understand. When you were at Brest, I thought of the evenings in that large town full of disreputable characters, with comrades who might drag you away, and as I know my Jack is a handsome fellow. I pictured horrible things; I was jealous. In the country with your mother, it is all right. I should even prefer you to prolong your stay, rather than to have you leave me a second time to go to see her again in a few months. Adieu, dearest, dearest. Kiss your mother for me and think of your little wife who adores you.

—Charlotte.

P. S. You reproach me for not mentioning any more, your colleague Simon. Mon Dieu, how he interests you. Well, then, he is in good health. I see him from time to time, but much less often than formerly. It amuses me to reflect that I once thought he was in love with me, but do not speak of it to your mother, dearest.

A Tribute to Judge Cabaniss

Let me offer this little tribute to the goodness of the heart that beats beneath the amiable exterior of Judge Cabaniss: It is recorded of this wise and upright Judge that he refused to forfeit the bail furnished for a wayward youth by a mother who would have sacrificed her life as readily as she gave her last dollar to save her child from the consequences of his sinning. The only reason assigned by Judge Cabaniss for his lenity in this case was that the boy "had blown away to the Arctic on a whaler and that in that region he would have opportunity to pick the pockets of nothing but polar bears," and that if this bail were forfeited it would cause the devoted mother to lose her home. Thus Judge Cabaniss, a very Daniel come to judgment, tempered mercy with humor. Deputy District Attorney Hanley, a veritable Javert in the stern and zealous performance of his "official duty," opposed the intention of Judge Cabaniss with all the fervor of a mediaeval jurist inflicting thumbscrew justice on a hapless culprit who had been caught in the very act of denying the infallibility of the Inquisition's decrees regarding transubstantiation. But Judge Cabaniss was firm in his loving kindness and all the law that could be cited from the depthless store of Hanley's vast erudition could not convince him that "the cause of justice" would be advanced the fraction of an inch by depriving this poor, sorrow-stricken mother of her home. His humanity revolted at such tyranny of the statutes made and provided for the protection of society against its enemies—not, as Judge Cabaniss interprets the law, for the oppression of unfortunate mothers who manifest their love for unworthy offspring by every sacrifice that motherhood may offer on behalf of that which it has borne for better or for worse. Let the deputy district attorney prate of "the cause of justice," Judge Cabaniss will have none of it—"the cause of justice" can take care of itself, even without the aid of a Hanley; but the mother who comes pleading at the bar where Justice herself sits on the bench with Judge Cabaniss, will not be compelled to plead in vain. Good for you, Judge Cabaniss; and know that in heaven's chancery the Recording Angel has heard your judgment and written it down in the Great Book under the tear that blotted out the oath of Uncle Toby forever.

Overlooking a Great Man

My favorite editor, Mr. Arthur Brisbane, is again subject to my critical judgment. His latest offense is one of omission. In one of his recent Sunday editorials he names "the world's five greatest men" as Archimedes, Michael Angelo, Shakespeare, Newton and Beethoven. Editor Brisbane's cardinal fault is cocksureness. There is nothing in the heavens above or in the earth beneath or even in the waters under the earth that Editor Brisbane has not dreamed in his philosophy. That's what's the matter with Brisbane. In this instance, for example, he thinks that because Archimedes was the greatest mechanician, Michael Angelo the greatest artist, Shakespeare the greatest poet and dramatist, Newton the greatest mathematician, and Beethoven the greatest musician, they are necessarily the greatest men that the world has produced. Neither the inference nor the deduction is correct. The five men named were great; each was the greatest in his specialty; but individually or collectively they were not the world's greatest men. As Editor Brisbane would himself declare, if he were writing on the subject of great men in another humor and at another time, the world's greatest men are those who have conferred the greatest benefit on their fellow men. The unknown savage that discovered the use of fire was greater than Archimedes; the hairy troglodyte that taught his fellow cave men to convey to each other intelligent ideas in the medium of howls, growls, groans, hissing sounds, whines, snarls, mutterings, murmurings and imitations of noises of nature, was a greater man than Michael Angelo; the man that formulated the first crude science of law was greater than Shakespeare; the man that first found a panacea for disease and taught the rules of health was greater than Newton; and the man that invented the alphabet was greater than Beethoven. But nobody knows the names of these greatest of all the men that have ever lived in this world, and it is not the fashion of great editors like Editor Brisbane to mention these great men. They are not harking back into the obscurity of the far distant ages to find great men. They prefer the easier task of citing examples familiar to the schoolboy and the man that reads as he runs. However, even in this citation Editor Brisbane omits the greatest man that has lived within the memory of men. Measured by the standard of greatest benefit conferred by a wise man on his fellow men, Francis Bacon was greater than any named in the Brisbane list—greater than all those named in combination. Francis Bacon taught men to reason upon the things that will best contribute to the well-being and happiness of humanity. He taught them how to get the most out of life by utilizing the beneficent forces of nature. He taught them how to conserve their own powers mentally, physically and spiritually. And Francis Bacon was the greatest man that has lived in historical time because men listened to his teaching and utilized his philosophy. All that we now possess of the things that minister to our bodily comfort and convenience may be traced to the result of Francis Bacon's philosophy. A greater than he was the man that taught the principle of brotherly love upon the axiom that we should do unto others as we would have them do to us; but that great teacher was not heeded and his axiom has ever remained a dead letter. But we have heeded the teaching of Francis Bacon and in spite of our hatred for one another and our insistence of doing unto others as we would not like to have them do unto us, we are happier and better conditioned than we could have been had Francis Bacon never lived. I suspect that the feet of my favorite editor are clay, and that he is unworthy to be my idol; but I would not for all the money Mr. Hearst pays him, ask him to take off his shoes.

terly disappointed because of its being apparent that his successor has no sympathy with the friends of the Roosevelt Administration. As a consequence we are promised a "coalition of magazines and weeklies" to "muckrake the Taft Administration" and bring about a Restoration in 1912. In San Francisco, it is well known, that Mr. Roosevelt's admirers do not at all approve of Mr. Taft. They had a premonition of what to expect immediately after his election when it was reported to them that he had told a Californian that while he favored Roosevelt's

THE QUEEN OF HOLLAND, WHO IS AWAITING A HAPPY EVENT

Holland has been awaiting, with loyal expectation, the birth of an heir to the throne, and preparations have been for some time in progress to give the little Prince or Princess a right royal welcome to the world. The question of the succession to the throne of the Netherlands makes the approaching happy event of more than usual interest, and increases the Queen's anxiety. Queen Wilhelmina was born in 1880, and succeeded to the throne at the age of ten. In 1901 she was married to Prince Henry of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, but this union has hitherto failed to provide the long-desired heir.

policies he inherited none of Roosevelt's animosities. Now Roosevelt's animosities were all that our local patriots had any passion for. Since forswearing those animosities Mr. Taft has given our patriots several jolts. He jolted them when he offered to take Senator Fulton into his official family and again when he made the editor of the Portland-Oregonian Minister to Mexico. The most recent jolt came a few days ago when the story came out from Washington that seeing George C. Pardee's name on a protest against the appointment of a Californian, he remarked: "It seems to me that whenever I see that man's name it's attached to a knock.

"Klexer, the painter, has painted a winter landscape so well that everyone who looks at it gets cold feet!"

"Yes, and everyone who sees his 'The Flight' flees!"

From His Autobiography

Charles Warren Stoddard, whose death occurred in Monterey, wrote his autobiography for Town Talk and it was published August 4, 1900. Briefly he told the story of his wanderings over the earth and of his settling down finally in the chair of English Literature in the Catholic University of America. "I was the sole layman," he wrote, "in Divinity Hall at the University, a house full of priests where his Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, the Archbishops, Bishops and Monsignori of the land were our frequent guests. After three severe years of community life I set up my household goods in the 'Bungalow,' where, with my foster-son, Kenneth O'Connor, I have been at home to those I love ever since." He also wrote: "Much of my life has, in the shape of episodes, furnished material for many sketches, but the half has not been told. I must confess that what I like best to write of in these days is the past; the past wherein I have lived and joyed and sorrowed; where I have met and mated with all sorts and conditions of men, women and children, and where—though in a certain sense I have so many years been homeless—I have been at home, for as the cowboy says, 'My home is under my hat.'"

He Appreciated His Obituary

During one of Mr. Stoddard's severe attacks of illness some years ago a report of his death was circulated. It was quickly followed by a contradiction, but in some way, the amended version was overlooked by the editor of the Overland Monthly, and a fitting obituary was penned and published in the succeeding number of the magazine. This soon came into the hands of the resurrected poet, who read it gravely through, and smilingly remarked that "It was worth dying for." The following letter, which he addressed to the eulogist is characteristic:

Dear Friend, whose name I know not—

In the Easter number of the Overland Monthly you have strewn the flowers of rhetoric upon my not unpremeditated grave. How can I thank you for a kindness—a loving kindness—the breath of which is as fragrant as the odor of sanctity? I was indeed dead, but am alive again! In a spirit of tranquillity the memory of which shall sweeten every hour of the new life I have entered upon, I received the Last Sacraments of the Church. Do you know how one feels under such circumstances? I feel as if I had been the unworthy recipient of some Order of Celestial Merit.

The perspective of my past is glorified—I had almost said sanctified—but I am painfully conscious of the conspicuous anticlimax in the foreground. Anticlimaxes are fateful and hateful, yet this anticlimax I must wrestle with even unto the end. It may be, it must be, that being spared I am spared for a purpose. In this hope I seek consolation; for I have unwittingly undone what was so prettily done for me. My anticipated taking-off was heralded to slow music; and had I not missed my cue, my exit should have been the neatest act in all my life's drama.

I know not what use you can make of this letter, unless you make it public in order that my readers may know that I am I—and not another posing as the ghost of my old self; and that I am yours, faithfully, affectionately and gracefully, —Charles Warren Stoddard.

His Checkered Career

It was Madame Th. Bentzon, who, in a thirty-page article in the Revue des Deux Mondes, characterized Charles Warren Stoddard as "the American Pierre Loti," and yet, complimentary as the term is in one sense, in another it is not characteristic, for there is a sense of loyalty and permanence about Stoddard which is missing in the French writer, who is more like a child on a holiday, eager to exhaust present pleasures and seek new. All his affections are transitive, and when he leaves a summer land of Eden it is always with the feeling that he has feasted on its tree of the knowledge of good and evil, while with Stoddard, there is ever the gold beneath the gray. Though born in the east, and a world wanderer, California may rightly claim Mr. Stoddard, for it was in the early fifties, when he was but twelve years of age, that he came first to San Francisco, and, with a boy's eagerness, in the most impressive years, he explored the peninsula and saw and recorded the sights and scenes of those early days, and there is no better record of old Yerba Buena than that which he has embodied in his "In the Footprints of the Padres." It was here that he made his first essays in literature, and was associated with the old Golden Era and the early Overland. It was Stoddard who recommended Bret Harte as editor of the Overland. "Bret Harte brought me up, you might say," Stoddard has said. "He took charge of me and made me write things just as well and often better than I could." It was Harte's idea that the series of articles which eventually formed "South Sea Idyls" should be written, after the first, "Chumming with a Savage," had appeared in the Overland. "And then," says Stoddard, "came my glorious failure as an actor. I didn't want to depend entirely on writing, and so tried my luck on the stage. Such luck! There was a change of bill every night, and I studied parts interminably. I played all kinds of things, from Lorenzo, in 'The Merchant of Venice,' to a burlesque of 'Kenilworth,' where I had a song and dance that had to be cut out because I could neither sing nor dance. Well, I was on the stage two months, and left it to go into a newspaper office, where I kept books without in the least knowing how." The experiences of that disastrous stage career are embodied in Mr. Stoddard's novel, "For the Pleasure of his Company." Stoddard lived for a while in what was left of one of the pioneer mansions of Rincon Hill. He describes it in full in "For the Pleasure of his Company," but it had also an interesting literary association. He wrote: "While I was biding my time, there came to me a lean, lithe stranger. I knew him for a poet by his unshorn locks and his luminous eyes and the pallor of his face and his exquisitely sensitive hands. As he looked about my eyrie with esthetic glance, almost his first words were: 'What a background for a novel!' He seemed to relish it all—the impending crag that might topple any day or hour; the modest side door that had become my front door because the rest of the building was gone; the ivy-roofed, geranium-walled conservatory wherein I slept like a babe in the wood, but in densest solitude and with never a robin to cover me. He liked the crumbling estate and even as much of it as had gone down into the depths forever. He liked the sagging and sighing cypresses with their roots in the air, that hung upon and clung upon the ragged edge of the remainder. He liked the shaky stairway that led to it (when it was not out of gear), and all that was irrelative and irrelevant, what might have been irritating to another man was to him singularly appealing and engaging; for he was a poet and a romancer, and his name was Robert Louis Stevenson. He used to come to that eyrie on Rincon Hill to chat and to dream; he called it 'the most San Francisco-y part of San Francisco,' and so it was. The little glimpse that Louis Stevenson had of it in its decay gave him a few realistic pages for 'The Wrecker.' One of the souvenirs of this friendship is a card slipped under the door one day when, coming to call on his friend, Stevenson found Stoddard absent:

"Oh, Stoddard! in our hours of ease,
Despondent, dull, and hard to please,
When coins and business wrack the brow
A most infernal nuisance thou!

"Oh, Stoddard, if to man at all,
To me unveil thy face—
At least to me—
Who at thy club and also in this place
Unwearied have not ceased to call,
Stoddard, for thee!

"I scatter curses by the row,
I cease from swearing never,
For men may come and men may go,
But Stoddard's out forever."

Creditor—So you want an extension of two weeks? What would happen if you were to die before the time elapses?
Debtor—Sir, I am too much of a gentleman to do that!

Taft's Prospective Visit

Representative McKinley writes that President Taft will in all probability visit San Francisco this summer. He also says that the President is eager to visit Alaska and will do so if he makes the trip to this coast. No President has ever visited the far northern territory which for so long has been a part of the United States. The President also wishes to attend the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition. Many vessels of the Pacific fleet will be stationed in and about Puget Sound during the Exposition, and the President will probably make the trip to Alaska on one of them.

Snobbery of the Sororities

The Alpha Sigma Sorority has been eating, drinking and making us merry in annual convention. What the Alpha Sigma Sorority may happen to be I have not the slightest idea, but I gather from my reading of their proceedings that they are something in the Greek letter curricula of feminine snobbery of our High Schools and University. These societies are, by legislative enactment, unlawful as they have appertained to the high schools of California; but a little thing like that doesn't feaze the young women who comprise the membership of the various "chapters"—some of the freshest of these buds and blossoms even went so far in their denunciation of the "horrid old laws" as to urge defiance of the statute in this case made and provided. But "saner counsels prevailed" and it was not necessary to call upon the police to quell the rioters. Among the speakers was Miss Frances Arnold of Sacramento who discoursed on "The Scholastic Alpha Sigma," referring to the high standard of educational achievement set by the sorority in the schools, and urging upon the members of the association the necessity of the utmost condescension in the attitude of the sisters toward non-sorority students. This is one of the things that the parents of "non-sorority students" have objected to in the Alpha Sigma and other so-called "sororities."—this "attitude of condescension" assumed by the superior creatures who comprise the membership of the feminine Greek letter societies of our public schools. The members of these societies are not chosen for their high scholarship or their surpassing mental ability; that sort of "superiority" does not enter into the scheme of these organizations. The first consideration is "family"; the second is "position in the social world"; the third is "her gowns"; the fourth is "her popularity"; the fifth is "how much can she afford for entertaining?" There are other qualifications, but these will suffice to give a general idea of the calibre of these high school and university "sororities." The inevitable result of this snobbish distinction among the short-skirted pupils of the high schools and the long-gowned co-eds of the State University, is a caste classification of the girls and young women in attendance at these public schools. It was speedily learned that unless you were a member of Alpha Sigma, or Alpha Delta Delta, or Omega Upsilon Beta Gamma, or some other of these fantastic mysteries of the Greek alphabet, you were little better than nobody at all, or, if you were intellectually superior to these "sisters" you were not in their class as "somebody." It was probably some such realization of the truth and its effect upon the polloi, that induced Miss Arnold to warn the Alpha Sigma sisterhood to condescend to an attitude of "fairness" toward the non-sorority students of the high schools and the university. There is enough snobbery in this fierce democracy as it is, without making it part of the primary education of our young. The legislature was wise in making it unlawful for the kids of our schools, male and female after their kind, to associate themselves into cliques of fools and snobs. The fools will develop naturally, and the snobs are always in the making without extraneous aid.

The Calhoun Case

In respect of the Calhoun case my solicitudes are as disquieting as they are variable and numerous. There have been so many mistrials, so many reversals, so much bungling that everything done by the Prosecution has begun to take on the aspect of a waste of effort. While it seems to be the unanimous opinion of lawyers that the case against Calhoun has petered out, still you never can tell what a jury will do, and consequently it is felt that provision should be made for divesting the future of abhorrent legacies. But you can't stop Mr. Heney, he is so erratic and so zealous in protecting the interests of the dear people. Furthermore it appears that Judge Lawlor doesn't always know when Mr. Heney is guilty of a fatal violation of the proprieties. Take the Glass case for example. We are told that the Glass case was reversed on a technicality, one that did not prejudice the rights of the defendant. We are told that the Court of Appeal found that Judge Lawlor erred not in doing something but in failing to do something, failing to give a certain instruction to the jury. This is quite true. But we have not been told that what Judge Lawlor failed to do was to render negligible the misconduct of Mr. Heney.

An Elementary Principle

When E. J. Zimmer was on the witness stand he refused to answer certain questions on the ground that his answers might tend to subject him to punishment for a felony. In his closing argument to the jury Mr. Heney said that Zimmer had testified before the grand jury. He told the jury that he know what Zimmer's testimony was and that he had not expected him to come into court and protect crime. The inference is of course obvious that the testimony given by Zimmer before the grand jury if repeated in court would establish the defendant's guilt. Now there is a well known rule of law touching this matter upon which Judge Lawlor was asked to instruct the jury. The rule was stated in this language: "You have no right to indulge in any presumption or inference unfavorable to the defendant because of the refusal of any witness to testify, or the failure of any witness to testify for the prosecution." Mr. Heney violated this ancient rule which almost every lawyer knows is elementary. The rule was passed on by our Supreme Court years before Mr. Heney became a prosecuting attorney. Cases have been reversed by our Federal courts because of the violation of this fundamental principle, and no Spreckels organ ever thought of censuring the judges who insisted that the rule must be adhered to. Yet apparently Judge Lawlor had never heard of the rule, for of course if he knew the law he would have expounded it. Now Patrick Calhoun is being tried before this same Judge Lawlor, and hence my state of nervous apprehension.

Broken Links

In addition to the possibility of a mistrial in the Calhoun case there is also the possibility of an acquittal. Indeed at this writing the case against Calhoun is so weak that lawyers about town are speculating as to whether it is about to collapse from insufficiency of evidence. Calhoun, it should be remembered, is not on trial for bribery. He is charged with having offered a bribe. The indictment on which he is now being tried charges him with having offered a bribe to one Nicholas. Now to establish this charge it is necessary to prove that Nicholas voted for the trolley franchise after having been guaranteed a bribe. The theory of the Prosecution is that Calhoun promised Ruef, Ruef promised Gallagher and Gallagher promised Nicholas. This is the chain that must be forged; and no chain is stronger than its weakest link. At this writing two links have been forged—the Nicholas link and the Gallagher link. Nicholas swears that he was promised by Gallagher and Gallagher swears that he promised Nicholas. Aside from the very bad character of these witnesses, and aside from the circumstance that they are eager to prove themselves worthy of their hire, their testimony is impeached by the records. They have stood before the jury discredited by themselves. It has been made pretty clear that Ruef never considered it worth while to promise his "good dogs" anything. He just ordered and they obeyed, and when he felt like it he threw them a bone. The defense has been making it pretty clear that such was the state of affairs. Perhaps that is why Mr. Heney has so frequently interrupted proceedings to express his willingness to go to jail. This throbbing and full charged publicist is doubtless longing for a little of cloistered seclusion.

On Judge Murasky's Trail

Shortly after Judge Murasky took under advisement the contempt case prosecuted by the United Railroads his cousin was summoned for jury duty in Judge Lawlor's court and the fact was brought out that he sometimes acted as appraiser for the United Railroads. This was merely a coincidence. It was a psychological coincidence. A little later the Boughton Bulletin, a paper that boosted Judge Murasky for the Supreme Court last fall, wanted to know why the friends of the Juvenile Court had secretly lobbied bills through the Legislature. Judge Murasky is the Juvenile Court. Then the supervisors who are controlled by the Holy Sanhedrim decided to hold up the appropriation for the Juvenile Court. Again: last Monday night Judge Murasky, who still has the contempt case under advisement, delivered an address on the Juvenile Court before the San Francisco Church Federation, one of the several adventitious aids to justice employed by the sanctified Spreckels outfit. Of course when Judge Murasky accepted the invitation to speak before that body he had no idea that he would hear the graft prosecution discussed by the churchmen, but as soon as he finished his address resolutions were adopted calling on all the people to get behind the unsavory and unscrupulous G. P. and denouncing all newspapers that have the courage to tell the truth. Judge Murasky must be enjoying the fun.

"I need the money myself, but I'll lend some to you if you'll promise not to keep it long."

"Don't worry, old chap. I'll spend it today!"

Home She Has None

Some towns, as Shakespeare didn't say, are born good, some achieve goodness—goodness only knows how—but San Francisco has had goodness thrust upon her. Stampeded by the solons of Sacramento, the horses are gone to grass, Canada, Pimlico or Mexico. Closed are the stable-doors at Emeryville, whence Temptation has been shipped by the carload. The nickel-in-the-slot-machine, we recall, is "scrap-iron, after July 1." As to the nickel "odium," as they call it south of Market street, 'tis even now passing through the ordeal of fire. Stationery stores have been restocked and Comstocked. Law-abiding citizens are eliminating "You bet you!" from their conversation. Two youthful law-breakers have been jailed for taking bets on the jaw-breakers in Pat Calhoun's barn; women's clubs required to give account of their goings on over "pons asinorum," as a geometrical friend of mine and morality rudely dubs bridge whist. Dr. Blue has played the pied piper, we have paid him, and the rats have taken to the tall timber, to the rooftrees, or refuge in milady's hair. There have been found twelve righteous to save the city of St. Francis from destruction. Ruef's days are numbered. Graft is dead, and the mourners go about the streets. There is silence as of the grave, save that money talks, that is to say, Heney. They who were once capital friends speak not as they pass by. As I have said, Virtue has been thrust upon us, Vice thrust from us. With the passing of the city hall, that stronghold of municipal corruption which long since capitulated to the seismic wave of moral reform, will pass the passing of maculate

Unlaureling Gaspar de Portola

With patience I stand waiting for some of our learned local historians to whack up the date and circumstance of the discovery of the bay of San Francisco by Captain Gaspar de Portola. It is my contention that the bay was not discovered by Portola, but I am open to conviction in that regard upon presentation of authentic proof and data to the contrary. I thought I was going to be confounded by irrefutable evidence in an unusually well-written article published last Sunday in the Examiner; and I read it with fear and trembling, albeit with close attention in the distant hope that I would not be compelled to doff my cap to a better and more accurate student of a history that all of us ought to know thoroughly from "the discovery" to the last question and ruling in the Calhoun trial. I feel as if I had come out of a pressing peril through the orifice of a narrow escape. In the beginning of his article the Examiner historian tells his readers that "Don Gaspar and his merry band of rovers, on the 4th of November, 1769, found themselves at the top of a rocky eminence, from which they gazed down upon the tranquil port of San Francisco." In the quoted history at the close of the article, which should confirm the previous statement of the Examiner historian, we read that "on October 31, 1769, from the summit of the Montara mountains were beheld Point Reyes and what was later known as the Gulf of the Farallones, the great bight between Point San Pedro and Point Reyes." The further excerpt from the elder historian, whom I suspect to be Theodore Hittell, (whose history has been impeached) informs us that Portola and his companions "descended the mountains and camped in the San Pedro valley," and that from here scouts were dispatched to explore the country to the northward. These explorers returned on the night of November 3d "with the information that they had received a report from the Indians that in a near port lay a vessel. This they felt satisfied was the much-needed supply ship." And so the strange, eventful history ends. There is absolutely no confirmation of the Examiner historian's statement that "Don Gaspar and his merry band of rovers, on the 4th of November, 1769, found themselves at the top of a rocky eminence, from which they gazed down upon the tranquil port of San Francisco." As a matter of fact the historian of the first part doesn't tell us what did happen on November 4th, 1769. He ends his narrative, as quoted by the Examiner historian on November 3d, 1769. Of course Captain Portola did do something on November 4th, but what? Did he turn back because he was short of provisions, as some of the other historians have told us; or did he ascend with his merry band of rovers" to the "top of a rocky eminence" and from that height "gaze down upon the tranquil port of San Francisco?" I call upon the Examiner historian to make good or take off his cap to me. I stand to my guns: The bay of San Francisco was not discovered by Captain Gaspar de Portola. It may have been discovered by some of his "merry band of rovers"; or it may have been discovered by the crew of that vessel which the Indians reported lying "in a near port," and which Portola and his "merry band" felt satisfied "was the much-needed supply ship." But I hold that other eyes and many of them "gazed down upon the tranquil port of San Francisco" before Portola laid his eyes upon it. So, go to it, ye merry men who would give old Gaspar the honor of a fiesta in commemoration of his "discovery"; and have at ye, all who doubt my honest denial.

The Awakening in San Rafael

The new era has opened in San Rafael. A special train arrived during the week bringing the crew of the Hotel Green from Pasadena, and three private cars of guests, mostly from the east, who will make Hotel Rafael their summer residence. Amongst them are Mrs. M. P. Jones, Mrs. W. J. Somers, Mrs. H. Forbes, Miss Forbes and maid, Wheeling, W. V.; Major T. D. DeFries, U. S. N.; Miss Ruth Hubbell; Theodore Gittings, Washington, D. C.; Mrs. Watson and Mrs. George Watson, New York; Mrs. Hutchinson and Mr. Frank Hutchinson, Swickley, N. J.; Mr. and Mrs. E. Y. Graham, New York; Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Woodcock, Mrs. Dean Chapman, Moline, Ill.; Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Stubbs, Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Reynolds, Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. F. C. Houghton, Mrs. John Manning, Miss Mary Manning and maid, Troy, N. Y.; Mrs. Rockefeller, New York; Mrs. L. M. Cousins, Dr. L. Williams, and W. B. Wickens, private secretary to Mr. Holmes, the manager of the hotel. Miss May Sutton, the woman tennis champion of the world, will arrive in a few days, accompanied by her mother and sister, and with the rebuilding of the tennis courts, the State tournaments in July, and the number of matches in which Miss Sutton will participate, it can be imagined with what keen interest the enthusiast of this sport are looking forward to the season. The new San Rafael Country Club have practically completed their arrangements for outdoor sports. A large bathing cove, tennis courts, a fine new golf course, a canal for motor boat racing and a magnificent club house are among the attractions they have furnished. By agreement with the directors of the club, Mr. Holmes is enabled to offer to his guests the privileges of the golf links, the bathing houses and all the other special advantages. The San Francisco Motor Club and the California Automobile Club have already planned a number of hill-climbing contests as well as road races between San Rafael and Petaluma, besides which, the supervisors of Marin county are now expending forty thousand dollars in repairing the roads about Sausalito, Tiburon and San Rafael.

THE NORTHWESTERN PACIFIC RAILROAD announces that it will run another excursion to Ukiah on Sunday May 2nd. This is California's most popular excursion. The ride is through Marin, Santa Rosa, Russian River and Ukiah Valleys and at this time of the year, with the orchards in full bloom and the wild flowers covering the fields, it is most delightful. At Ukiah the excursionists will have over 4½ hours during which visits may be made to Vichy Springs, the Fish Hatchery, the Asylum and the Rancheria. Each ticket sold insures a seat as there are no more tickets sold than there are seats provided. The rate for the round trip is only $2.50 and tickets are now on sale at 874 Market street and at the Ferry. The leaving time from San Francisco will be 8:45 a. m. and from Ukiah on the return 5:00 p. m.

MURINE EYE REMEDY CO., Chicago, Ill.
Gentlemen:—We have a little fellow four months old who was troubled for three months after birth with sore eyes. A large amount of pus came from them, accompanied with severe inflammation. Our family Doctor, also an Eye Specialist, attended him without relief.
I saw your MURINE EYE REMEDY advertised in one of our Electric Cars, and utterly discouraged, I resolved to try it, and do you know, in three days' time all worry was over. In one week the Sore Eyes were a thing of the past.
This is an unasked for testimonial, but I know you will accept it as it is sent with much gratitude toward MURINE EYE REMEDY.
Yours truly,
Arthur Snow.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks

Little can be said regarding stock market values during the past week. The market might be termed a ragged one,. weakness and strength here and there Some anxiety was manifested regarding the trouble in Turkey, fears being entertained that possibly other nations might be drawn into the affair. The selling of stocks came from abroad but was not of sufficient volume to disturb the home-buying power. The general market shows remarkable strength to withstand all the bearish pressure that has come to light during the past three months, tariff adjustment at home and foreign disturbances of sufficient importance to have caused a severe break in security-values under other conditions. It is apparent who the owners of our securities are. The one thing that will affect price values for the next sixty days will be crop conditions, which at this time are very good. Spring wheat acreage will show an increase of more than 2,500,000 acres thereby offsetting the decreased winter wheat acreage. Talk of Harriman's big merger plans has the street guessing some. Hawley has again taken hold of M. K. & T. which is tipped for higher prices. In the industrial list Ice Preferred is said to be a good purchase. Western Pacific stock sold at 34½ on Monday. I still believe the price will go above 50 this year. The Wall Street Journal in a recent issue says: "The rise in telephone securities possesses unusual interest in displaying for the first time in these stocks a considerable buying demand from abroad, the London investor contrasting the great efficiency of the telephone system here with that maintained by the government at home, and becoming bullish to a marked degree on his new favorite."

Grain

The record of transactions in Chicago in wheat the past week was unusual. The week began with May around 128. In two days the July was down from over 118 to 112¼ and after one bull day—Wednesday, the panicky selling was resumed and the closing days of the week brought nothing but sharp breaks until finally prices landed at a low point during Saturday's session. Holders of wheat had been punished so hard during the week that there was little fight left in them and although there was considerable in the news that was bullish, there was no good recovery. The decrease of over 2,200,000 bushels in the visible, the reduction of 7,500,000 bushels in world's stocks by Bradstreets and the continued buying of cash wheat all counted for nothing. Associates of the leaders were sellers late in the week. At the same time there was some improvement in the weather conditions and the crop outlook. It was the weakness in the English market this morning which caused bottom prices to be made here. The market is off 12 cents a bushel from high point for the July. Barring some sensational news from some foreign quarters it is felt that the cleanup has been general, the selling possibly has been over done and we look for the market to right itself and do better in sympathy with the very strong cash situation, decreasing stocks and the doubtful new crop outlook at best.

Cotton

Many explanations are offered from all directions for the rapid advance in the Cotton Market, but we are inclined to think that it is more of a re-adjustment to the inevitable higher level for all articles of any value due to the silent but effective lifting power of the enormous inflation of the World's Gold Supplies with its attendant abundance of investment seeking money. If such re-adjustment is now manifesting itself in a sudden and violent form it is because extraneous circumstances, such as the financial panic of last year and the resultant general business depression had, for the time being, checked the natural tendency for higher values until now, when the long suppressed force is seeking an outlet in an upward direction, and, judging from the powerful resistance to all onslaught from the combined energy of the consistent bears and the sorely disappointed sold out bulls, it must be concluded that enough latent power remains available for further forceful action in favor of the market. Long-headed men who plan for the future and let the present take care of itself are looking forward to the first government reports. The big rise in prices may increase the acreage prepared for cotton, but the weather will regulate planting. But allowing the possibility of an enlarged acreage, the crop's condition is likely to be low. Unfavorable weather in Texas as well as some sections of the eastern belt makes that at the moment seem certain. It seems to be the opinion of many that only West Texas is suffering from the present unprecedented drought, but latest reports insist that the great producing section of Central Texas is little better and even East Texas is sending complaints of unpropitious and alarming weather conditions, the scattered and comparatively light rains having been of little or no benefit to the parched soil, being invariably followed by cold and drying north winds so that conditions generally in that great State remain deplorable in the extreme, and we are bold enough to predict that this leading State, even with the most favorable weather from now on, will not produce a large crop. Meantime spot markets continue to advance with demand increasing.

No Smugglers in Burlingame

The rumor will not down that some of our most exclusive aristocrats of Burlingame know more than they care to tell about the mysterious five trunks filled with Parisian costumes and finery loved by women and valued at $25,000 which were confiscated by the Federal authorities in New York. It is said that these trunks are the cause of a good deal of uneasiness in our smart set. These reports, I am sure, emanate from some rude person who wishes to propagate a scandal at the expense of our smart set. It is inconceivable that there are any smugglers among the elect of San Francisco society. Incidentally it is incredible that the Government officials are thinking of summoning the Carolans as witnesses in the United States Court. What do the Carolans know about smuggling? To involve Francis Carolan in this inquiry would be as absurd as to try to implicate our invulnerable civic patriot, Mr. Rudolph Spreckels, who hasn't been over to Europe since 1904 when he made the trip with Mr. James D. Phelan. The Carolans are among Mr. Spreckels's most ardent admirers and warmest sympathizers, and it wouldn't surprise me very much to learn that Mr. Spreckels out of his passion for punishing offenders against the government had resolved upon the prosecution of an inquiry into this very matter of smuggling, which is one of the meanest and most contemptible crimes that a rich man can commit.

A Newhall Witticism

At the Pacific Union Club the other night, the topic of conversation happened to be the approaching Newhall-McBean wedding. Mayo Newhall, was as a matter of course, the recipient of congratulations, felicitations, and possibly, expostulations, for when some friend asked, "Now, what do you think of the match yourself, Newhall?" he answered, "Why, I'm satisfied. Margaret isn't doing at all as well as her mother did,—but he's a very nice chap, just the same."

Mrs. Graham's Pleasing Innovation

According to the veracious Examiner the smart set is in a great state of excitement over the startling announcement of the impending separation of the George D. Grahams, which is said to have been made by Mrs. Graham at a musicale which she gave to her intimate friends. What particular smart set is affected by this news is something of which I am ignorant. I am quite sure it is not the Burlingame smart set because I am certain that Mrs. Graham has never entered any of the ladies of Burlingame on her visiting list. I am likewise certain that the fashionable flock which is shepherded by Mr. Greenway is not affected. Mrs. Graham does not dance at the Assemblies, nor is she one of the patronesses of the Colonial Balls. Nevertheless Mrs. Graham, the Examiner tells us "has been a distinctive figure in the social life of San Francisco." Moreover she is "a witty raconteur and makes friends readily." She loves art and "has been praised by masters for her vibrant nudes." All of which makes it obvious that the smart sets that have not known Mrs. Graham have been short of much edification which might have been available. It is fairly certain that she is a woman of originality, for she has introduced the fashion of announcing an impending domestic rupture with some of the circumstance and eclat that have hitherto been reserved for engagement announcements. I am of the opinion that musicales will become much more popular if those to whom invitations are sent may have reason to believe that the hostess purposes taking them into her confidence with reference to the status of her domestic affairs.

The Lady and the Count

According to the European press the marriage of Muriel White, daughter of the United States Ambassador to France and Count Scherr-Thoss is grounded entirely in sentiment. This match has not the slightest taint of mercenary motive. It is one of the most brilliant matches ever made by an American girl. By this marriage Miss White becomes allied to one of the most distinguished families in Europe, possessed of estates so large that in comparison her father's money is but a drop in the bucket. As to social position there is no suspicion of either party being animated by that motive since both are of the inner circle of the aristocracy of Europe. Count Scherr-Thoss is twenty-nine years old. Miss White is twenty-five. The Count is the eldest of four sons and will succeed to the hereditary Prussian peerage and to a great estate in Prussian Silesia. He is well known in diplomatic circles having served as attache of the German Embassy in Austria and as attache to the German Embassy at Paris. Miss White has spent most of her life abroad with her parents. For years her father was first secretary of the American Legation in London. She made her debut in 1900. At that time she was bridesmaid for Lady Marjorie Primrose when she married the Earl of Crewe. Later her father was appointed Ambassador to Italy, and she lived for awhile in Rome. About that time it was rumored that she was engaged to Marshall O. Roberts. Two years later came the rumor that she would wed Lord Howard de Walden. After her father's appointment to Paris her name was coupled with several members of the French nobility, but it took a pleasure trip to Berlin to settle her fate. She met the Count in Berlin while her parents were visiting in Italy.

COUNT SCHERR-THOSS
The rich Prussian who married the daughter of Ambassador White.

Marriage of One of the Whitney Sisters

A wedding which will interest society people on both sides of the bay, owing to the prominence of the bride's family, is that of Miss Ethel Whitney of Oakland and Charles Allen of New York, which took place on April 24th, in Litchfield, Conn., at the home of the bride's sister, Mrs. Seymour Cunningham, formerly Stephanie Whitney, whose baptismal name was bestowed on her in remembrance of her uncle, the late Associate Justice Stephen J. Field of the United States Supreme Court. Never were there five more popular and interesting girls in the same household than the Whitney sisters, daughters of the late Senator George and Mrs. Whitney. Mollie Whitney is now Mrs. George Hughes. Violet and Anita are still single. Miss Ethel, the recent bride, the youngest of the family, resided in Washington for many years, with her aunt, Mrs. Condit-Smith, whose death last year caused the postponement of the wedding. Mr. Allen is a lawyer of some prominence in New York and a son of Brigadier-General Allen, U. S. A. The young couple will reside permanently in New York.

Graduate of the Kermess

The fact that Mrs. Horton Phipps has been caught by the glare of the footlights once more is a matter of no great surprise in social circles. Report has it that the stage was her chosen career before marriage and that the Kermess, with its attendant excitements and applause awakened the dormant inclination, so she is now to take her place again in vaudeville. Her contract for an engagement of some weeks has been duly signed, and the matter has progressed beyond the stage of "they say." It is said that the husband does not altogether approve of his wife's course. He belongs to a family more devoted to church than to state or stage, and his mother and his aunt, Miss Suzanne McEwen, president of the Doctor's Daughters, are always foremost in church movements. It is supposed that they look askance on this latest move of the daughter and niece-in-law. Another Kermess contribution to the stage, I hear, is Margaret Thompson. She is the youngest of the three Thompson girls, the eldest of who, Kathleen, will become the bride of Charles Gilman Norris on the thirtieth of this month. Kathleen Thompson left on Friday last with Mrs. Norris Sr. for New York, where the marriage will take place at the home of her uncle, Rear-Admiral Lyon. In a few weeks Margaret will go east to join her, and her time in New York will be spent ostensibly in visits to relatives. There is a sub-current of rumor that her leisure moments will be devoted to a study of the stage and how to get there, and in case she receives the encouragement she hopes for, her two-months' visit will be prolonged indefinitely. She is an exceptionally pretty girl of a pure blonde type, and temperamentally fitted for the career she craves, so her friends are hoping that family opposition will be overcome and that she will not be obliged to relinquish her ambitions in deference to conventions.

Such a Loving Couple!

The guests at one of the season's largest and most fashionable dinners were treated to a diversion—dare one call it a side-show?—by the performance of a young married couple who evidently are yet too much absorbed in each other to remember surroundings and the conventions. It seems to be an established custom with them, however, and society is meditating on some method of putting an end to the exhibition without annihilating the offenders. Between courses, the benedict leaves his place at the table, strolls around to his wife's chair, and bestows on her a long and lingering soul-kiss which, however complacently she accepts, is decidedly embarrassing to those forced to witness it. Then he proceeds to caress her neck, her arms, her hair, and a dead, oppressive silence falls upon the company until someone breaks it with a hysterical giggle or an inane remark, and conversation is resumed until the end of the course, when the program is repeated. One of the bride's most intimate friends has emphatically declared that she means to erect a screen in a corner of her dining room so that either the osculatory couple or the rest of the company may retire during the amatory intervals. Some one else has suggested that a manual of etiquette, duly marked and annotated at the chapter devoted to conduct and demonstrations in public might answer the purpose.

Special Accommodations for Bow-Wows

The Francesca Club is about to build a home, and, so I hear, some novel features will be introduced. Chief of these is to be a dog room for the accommodation of the aristocratic canines, and as there is scarcely a member of the organization who is not the mistress of a pampered pet, the innovation will be regarded as a concession to necessity, for the charming little doggies accompany their owners everywhere, and it is often a problem to know how to dispose of them for an hour or two, with due consideration of their own and their mistresses' social rank and importance. Children, of course, can be left at home in the nursery, but dogs are another story. It is manifestly impossible to leave them in the street or on the steps, and in the bridge room there is always the possibility of their creating a disturbance which would interfere with the even progress of the game. So, after due deliberation and consultation, the president of the club and the architect have put their heads together, and the result is this spacious well aired and comfortable dog room. As yet we have not learned the particulars—whether kennels or cages are to be provided or whether the canine contingent of the Francesca is to wander at liberty under supervision of special attendants, but in any event, the dog room is an assured fact. Most of the first class hotels in the east make special provision for the comfort of their canine guests, and, no doubt, before the Francesca building is completed, a special emissary will be dispatched to investigate and report on the latest improvements and innovations.

The Fete du Printemps

There was a mild flutter of curiosity as to why Mrs. Eleanor Martin and her granddaughters should have been so interested in the "Fete du Printemps," which was arranged for the benefit of the French missions for homeless children. The explanation is simple. The Harvey girls attended a convent school in Paris. The nuns of this convent were recently banished and took up their residence in Japan. They were burned out there, and it was the double disaster of banishment and conflagration which excited the active sympathy of their former pupils and through them of their relatives and friends. The French nuns are now engaged in missionary labors in the Orient. Their charity extends not only to the Chinese and Japanese children but to those of mixed and white descent who are unfortunate enough to suffer. Education and reclamation of the needy is their object. A rumor was circulated amongst society folk that the "Fete du Printemps" was a disguised effort to show sympathy with the Japanese. One of the most interesting numbers on the program at the "Fete du Printemps" last Wednesday evening was "The Lady of Shalott," Tennyson's poem set to music by the young local composer, Albert Elkus, who presided at the piano while Miss Alice Coleman, with her rich mezzo-soprano voice, interpreted the words. This musical setting to the poem was first produced a few months ago at the Spinners' Club, where it was most enthusiastically re-

When David Bispham was here Mr. Elkus went over the music with him and Mr. Bispham was so pleased that he desired to take "The Lady of Shalott" for next season. Musical critics speak highly of Mr. Elkus' ability to take another's thoughts as revealed in poetry and give expression to them in his own art of music. It is novel, pleasing and artistic.

Defying the Hoodoo

The date of the wedding of Margaret Bender and Philip Young is May 22nd. Evidently Miss Bender takes no stock in superstition, for not only is she willing to be married in May, but the date selected falls on a Saturday, "no luck at all," and as if that were not sufficient, the engagement ring is a beautiful opal surrounded by diamonds. To offset the evil omens, those who have met the groom pronounce him an exceptionally fine fellow, good-looking, attractive, and well endowed with goods and gear. He will arrive during the course of the coming week, and everyone is looking forward to meeting the man who has succeeded in luring away another of California's talented daughters. Miss Bender has a host of warm friends who regret that after her marriage her home will be in the east, but society is becoming reconciled to that, for it happens so often in these days as to seem all but inevitable.

Mood Expressed by Millinery

At a St. Francis luncheon the other day the question of clothes, extreme styles, and the courage of those who are brave enough to wear whatever fashion dictates, was under discussion. "I don't care," was the assertion of one of the girls, "you can tell a whole lot about a woman's disposition by the clothes she wears." Just then a Burlingame matron, with anything but a smiling countenance, passed the table with a surly nod and a grim glance. "Yes, indeed you can tell," assented another of the maids, "for there goes Mrs. ———— now, and she's wearing a bunch of lemons on her hat."

When the Japanese Cruisers Come

The coming of the Japanese cruisers, and the entertainments which are to be given in honor of the visitors at the Fairmont brings to mind the story of the Chinese prince who, with the Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, arrived with their entourage on a special mission to this country some time ago. Before the ship had docked, the prince, looking across the water at the beautiful white Fairmont crowning the hill said: "And whose is the beautiful white palace I see?" "Your highness," answered his escort, "that is yours while you are in San Francisco." There will be two important functions given at the Fairmont in honor of the visiting Japanese naval officers. One will be a grand reception by the merchant and civic bodies in the ball room and the other an imposing banquet by the Japanese diplomatic officials of this port in honor of their countrymen.

Elman at the St. Francis

Mischa Elman, the seventeen-year-old boy whose musical genius has excited the world and who was brought out by Will Greenbaum, was presented at the last concert of the St. Francis Musical Art Society on Wednesday evening. It was in many ways the most unqualified success of the season, most of all because of the absence of the usual tittering, whispering and fidgetting on the part of the audience so that the effect of Elman's marvelous playing was not married. He won his auditors from the start and held them to the end. He is said to talk in four languages and converse in none, but his violin is his interpreter and music his tongue. His expressive face records every feeling. His taste seems to favor music in a minor key, but his audience caught his moods. Society is kind enough to praise him, and it is hoped that the St. Francis will secure him next winter, when the society hopes to present Eames, Gadski and a number of other musical artists of repute.

Social Life at Del Monte

Del Monte and vicinity are in the midst of the whirl of things just now. A number of eastern parties have had their automobiles shipped to the coast, and with the regular contingent of California motorists, the roads are thronged. Two of the recent San Francisco bridal couples, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Weller Sefton Jr., and

Mr. and Mrs. J. Russell Selfridge, have been at Del Monte during the week. Miss Mary H. Krout of Chicago, who has been assisting Mrs. Wallace in the preparation of the memoirs of the late General Lew Wallace, is making a visit to California, and for the present, stopping at Del Monte. Hayter Reed of Montreal, manager of a combination of sixteen or eighteen Canadian hotels, is visiting all the big resorts in California to see how such things are done in the west, and Lieutenant and Mrs. Emory Winship, P. C. Harris and Lieutenant J. W. Ward are added to the military list. Lieutenant Ward, who is at Pacific Grove for a month, is now stationed at Fort Douglas, Utah. He was at Monterey when the troops first came to the Old Capital, and assisted in laying out the grounds and locating the buildings of the Presido. Judge and Mrs. Hyland, who will make a tour of Europe later in the year, are guests of Dr. W. T. Jamison. Mr. and Mrs. Francis Sullivan, Miss Alyce Sullivan and Frederick Laurence Murphy are visiting the Harveys, partly as a relaxation from the prenuptial gaieties that have been showered upon the young people.

The Beringer Musical Club Recital

The concert given by the members of the Beringer Musical Club last week attracted all the listeners that Century Hall could accommodate. The program showed the widest variety, there being instrumental numbers by Mendelssohn, Chopin, Richard Strauss and Liszt, rendered by Miss Stella McNeil, Mr. Melton Mowbray, Miss Alta Yocum and Miss Frances Worthington. Vocal selections from Schumann, Schubert, Tosti and Arditti were by Mrs. Agnes Burrell, Miss Irene De-Martini, Miss Anna Fritz and Miss Anita Morse. The interpretation of the different numbers aroused much enthusiasm and the participants were awarded a due meed of applause for their respective performances.

The Nora of Nazimova

By Theodore Bonnet

Ibsen having returned to town the lovers of problem plays and solvers of psychological phenomena are busy again. The Ibsen story, it is said, never exists for its own sake but for the sake of a very definite moral idea. Consequently the Norwegian has been very much misunderstood, for everybody has his own conception of the moral idea in each play and of what Ibsen meant and of the lesson he wished to convey. It is unfortunate that Ibsen is admired principally for his homiletics since he is above all things a playwright. Always more of a dramatist than a preacher his theories about life are much less important than his pictures of spiritual conflict, pictures that are essentially human and representative of typical rather than of commonplace elements in real life. What could be more inspiring than the pictures which are presented in "A Doll's House." They lack flesh-and-blood reality, I've heard it said. Even as recent as the making of Madame Nazimova's acquaintance at the Van Ness Theatre critics have so affirmed and a no less familiar type than the house pet, Nora, has been described in a burst of sceptical dissent as "the woman who deserted her children." As though no further proof were required of the implausibility of the character! This with the raucous echoes of the Evans domestic tragedy still irritating our ears. Now here I am saying things which might involve me in an agonizing Ibsen controversy, and well do I know how dangerous it is to dogmatize about Henrik. Let me avert disaster by hastening to explain that it is not my purpose to expound the man that dramatized the inner conscience but merely to record the triumph of an actress who but recently began the conquest of American theatredom—Madame Nazimova. A very artistic, winsome little actress is Nazimova, possessing the capacity for expressing deep human emotion and portraying vividly the moving sensations of a high-strung soul. Nora of the Doll's House as conceived by Nazimova is the intensely human creature that Ibsen designed and fashioned, and she plays that pungent personality exactly, I believe, according to the Norwegian poet's intention. She plays it with great force, with infectious vivacity. She makes of it an object lesson, warming it into life, putting color, passion and humor into it, mirroring forth a tragedy of mental anguish. But Madame Nazimova is frankly an actress. Her conception of acting is to act every moment of her time on the stage. Her acting is logical rather than imaginative, but it is nevertheless effective. To achieve the sharp sense of contrast she goes in for the most emphatic character painting, and while she creates the illusion of graceful spontaneity you realize that she is acting. Observe her closely and you will see her in the act of modelling emotion. When she abandons herself to a mood the inspiration is the author's, the method is hers. It must not be supposed, however, that her technic lacks subtlety. In her repression she is eloquent, she speaks her lines with an enchanting naturalness of beauty, her naivete is almost Billy Burkish, and it is only when suiting the action to the word that she appears too demonstrative. She is a woman of much physical charm and with magnetism to spare. The players with Nazimova are so Ibsenesque in manner and appearance that they belong in a class by themselves. Especially is this true of Mr. Brandon Tynan who plays Thorwald Helmer earnestly and looks it absolutely. His very hair seems to have grown for the role of a New England Puritan or a San Francisco reformer. Self-righteousness is stamped on his brow and beams from his eyes.

Stage

"Quality Street" at the Alcazar

Most of the dramatic quips and manners which constitute "Barrieisms" are to be found in "Quality Street," which will have its first production in a stock theatre next Monday evening at the Alcazar. Those who saw the comedy two years ago at the Van Ness, when Maude Adams and her company presented it, were ready to pronounce it the best thing in her repertoire. Its characters are flesh and blood people who say and do things in an ordinary way, but there is an indescribable charm of quaintness in both the pathos and the humor which is a distinguishing mark of Barrie's work. The four acts chiefly concern Phoebe Throssel and her sister Susan, who dwell in a small street in an English town during the time of the Napoleonic wars. Dr. Valentine Brown is the only male person admitted to the prim household and Phoebe falls in love with him. He enlists in the ranks and goes to fight the Corsican ogre, leaving Phoebe to nurse her disappointment in impecuniosity, for, by following Brown's advice the sisters have invested and lost their savings, and in order to maintain themselves they have been obliged to open a private school for young children. When the second act opens nine years have elapsed. Dr. Brown returns with a captain's commission and an empty sleeve. He is shocked to find the sisters in such reduced circumstances, and Phoebe is piqued by his lack of cordiality. There is to be a military ball, and she decides to attend it, garbed in the gown she had intended for the wedding which did not eventuate. So rejuvenated is she by the costume that Dr. Brown fails to recognize her, and she passes for her own niece, Miss Livvy, and goes to the ball in the assumed character. The third act shows a marquee adjoining the ball room, where she outdoes the captain's wildest notions of sprightly feminine conduct and he exerts himself to the utmost to make a conquest, his head being turned by her beauty and coquetry. All the men are at her feet and he is spurred on by the rivalry. Act four finds "Miss Livvy" ill and Dr. Brown, called in attendance, discovers her identity. He hears then, for the first time, of the unfortunate investment which has obliged the sisters to turn school mistresses, and like a soldier and a gentleman, he enables Phoebe to fulfill her nine year-old dream. Child life, which Barrie, more than any living playwright understands, is presented in the second act of "Quality Street," where a school room scene is introduced. Evelyn Vaughan will have the part created by Maude Adams, and that she will portray the character delightfully goes without saying to all who saw her as "Babbie," in that other Barrie gem, "The Little Minister." Mr. Lytell promises to be more than interesting as Dr. Brown, and the rest of the Alcazar favorites will be as fittingly placed in the play.

Mischa Elman's Farewell With Symphony Orchestra

Mischa Elman's farewell concert will be given on Sunday afternoon, May 2, at the Garrick Theatre, and it has been arranged that he will appear on this occasion in combination with the Russian Symphony Orchestra, the organization with which he made his debut in America and created such a sensation by his rendition of the difficult "Concerto" by Tschaikowsky. The Russian Orchestra, with its gifted conductor, Modest Alstchuler, is ranked as one of the best in the world, and outside of New York and other of the biggest cities such a treat has seldom been offered music lovers. Elman and the Russian Orchestra together, with no increase in prices is a fair sample of the sort of thing Manager Will Greenbaum delights to bring about. The program for the occasion will be novel and interesting, containing works by Russian composers which have never been heard here before. Elman's numbers will be Tschaikowsky's "Concerto" and the fantatise on "Otello," by Ernst. The orchestral numbers will include "Khowanschina" (Sunrise on the Moskva River) Musorgski; "March Slav," Tschaikowski; "Andante Cantabile," Tschaikowski; "Mosquito Dance," Liadow; and "Two Caucassian Sketches," by Ippolitoff-Ivanow, in one of which Mr. Jacob Altschuler will play a violin obligato and Mr. Edward Raho an English horn obligato. Sunday, May 2, will be a red letter day in the musical annals of San Francisco. Seats on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, corner of Sutter and Kearny streets. The box office at the theatre will be open Sunday at 10 a. m.

Nazimova's Second Week

Madame Nazimova's second week at the Van Ness will be doubly interesting because the two bills will provide a comparison such as is not generally offered in a single week by a successful star. From the strong emotional scenes of "Hedda Gabler" the star will change to the light comedy of "Comtesse Coquette," and Ibsen and Roberto Bracco will be brought into contrast. The Ibsen play is billed for Monday and Tuesday and the Bracco comedy will fill out the last four days of the week with matinees on Wednesday and Saturday. Madame Nazimova has offered "Hedda" in many countries but always before in Russian. She has been seen in "Comtesse Coquette" only in this country, having presented it for half a season during her New York run. Both plays will be elaborately staged and Madame Nazimova will wear some notable gowns in each play. Her San Francisco engagement is limited to this week after which she will be seen in San Jose, Sacramento, Oakland, Portland and Seattle.

The Shakespearean Festival

The great dramatic event of the year is the coming of the Ben Greet Players and the Russian Symphony Orchestra. This combination of histrionic and musical ability numbers over one hundred people. In the orchestra alone there are forty of the best musicians, under the graceful leadership of Modest Altschuler, famed for his wonderful interpretations of the great Russian composers. Mr. Greet's company is composed of about thirty-five players, dancers and singers, amongst them some of New York's best known professionals. The works of Shakespeare have served as an inspiration to some of the greatest composers, and their musical settings will be used with these presentations. Never before has such an orchestra toured the States, and this promises to be one of the most splendid spectacles ever witnessed in the west. The opening performance in this city will be given in the Garrick Theatre on Monday evening, May 3d. For this night "A Midsummer Night's Dream" has been selected and with it will be rendered Mendelssohn's exquisite musical setting. On Wednesday and Sunday afternoons the same play will be repeated. Included in the orchestral renditions will be all the familiar Mendelssohnian selections—his Overture; Allegro di Molto; Scherzo; Allegro vivace; March of the Fairies; Song of the Fairies; Intermezzo; Allegro Appassionate; (Hermia, seeking Lysander, loses herself in the wood); Melodrama Allegro; Nocturne andante; the famous "Wedding March"; Allegro vivace; Melodrama allegro commodo (accompanying "the most lamentable comedy and most cruel death of Pyramus and Thisbe"). There will be a grand final chorus of fairies, and incidental to the play Miss Grace Clark Kahler will sing two solos—"Ye Spotted Snakes" and "Through this House." Mr. Greet not only has the personal supervision of the whole dramatic production but he also takes an important part in the plays. In this case he will give a wonderful portrayal of "Bottom, the Weaver." "Hermia" will be played by Miss Irene Rooke; "Hipollyta" by Miss Grace Halsey Mills; "Queen of the Fairies" by Miss Ruth Vivian, and "Helena" by Miss Violet Vivian. "Puck" will be attractive in the hands of George Vivian, and Milton Rosmer will be "Oberon," the Fairy King. On Tuesday and Thursday nights "The Tempest" will be given with incidental music by Sir Arthur Sullivan. Tschaikowsky's "Overture Fantasie" will also be rendered and between two of the scenes an Interlule, "Isle of Dove," by Glazounow, from the suite, "The Middle Ages," will be given. The Interlude is presented by spirits and is featured by a fairy-like dance by Miss Ruth Vivian—scene, an enchanted island. Mr. Greet will play "Caliban," Milton Rosner, "Ferdinand," Miss Irene Rooke, "Ceres," Miss Grace Halsey Mills, "Iris," and Miss Violet Vivian "Miranda." With the beautiful Beethoven music, "As You Like It," will be presented on Friday evening, and on Saturday night the company will give "Romeo and Juliet," with incidental music by Gounod, Tschaikowsky's "Fantasie-Overture" and "Intermezzo," and Glazounow's "Preambule" (a Spanish Episode). The leading roles will be taken by Milton Rosner and Miss Violet Vivian. Mr. Greet will play "Friar Lawrence." It is seldom that we are treated to such a wonderful combination of music and drama and these interpretations will be long remembered as the most beautiful presentations California has ever seen. Seats may be proeured from Sherman, Clay & Co., prices 75 cents to $2.00.

Shakespearean Plays at the Greek Theatre

A bright moonlight night is promised for the presentation of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" at the Greek Theatre this Saturday night, May 1, when the Ben Greet players and the magnificent Russian Symphony Orchestra will give the play in the wonderful open-air theatre. A more suitable play could not have been selected, and the effect, with myriads of electric lights, etc., will be superb. Saturday afternoon, May 8, the same organizations will present "The Tempest" with the music of Sir Arthur Sullivan and Tschaikowsky. Seats are on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s in San Francisco and Oakland and at the usual places in Berkeley.

"A Chinese Honeymoon"

The production of "A Chinese Honeymoon" at the Princess Theatre has resulted in new, great and distinct successes for May Boley and Fred Mace who are simply inimitable in their respective roles. Mr. Mace as Mr. Pineapple cleverly and humorously hits off the traits of the Englishman on tour and his songs and feminine entanglements are greatly enjoyed by the audiences. May Boley fairly revels in the role of Fifi, the Cockney waitress at the hotel and her song, "I Wants To Be a Lydy" secures for her quite a number of encores. She introduces with great comic effect in the last act, her shop girl specialty which is if anything more popular than ever. Helen Darling and James F. Stevens, who appear respectively as the Princess Soo Soo and Tom Hatherton carry off the lyric honors of the performance and are particularly successful in their duets. Zoe Barnett is certainly a very vivacious and attractive young bride and Ethel Du Fre Houston is excellent as the domineering official mother-in-law. Special praise should be awarded to Oliver Le Noir for his performance of Hang Chow, the Chinese Emperor. Mr. Le Noir contributes in no slight degree to the success of the entertainment and at times suggests Edwin Stevens. Budd Ross is particularly good as the Chinese Lord Chancellor and Jennie Metzler and Myrtle Dingwall are worthy of complimentary mention. The chorus is as fascinating as ever and the staging and costuming of the play are gorgeous and appropriate. The success of "A Chinese Honeymoon" is so great that it will be continued another week which will positively be its last.

BURTON HOLMES IN MOROCCO

Orpheum Vaudeville

Mrs. Horton Forrest Phipps, the beautiful young society dancer who carried off the honors at the recent Kermess will make her appearance at the Orpheum next week. She has assumed the stage name of La Valera. She will do the Spanish dances La Manola, La Banda and La Tarantella. She will wear several costly, picturesque and characteristic costumes. Angela Dolores, an attractive and clever young actress will, with the assistance of her own company, present a witty farce by Edgar Allen Wolff and Ida Von Troutman, entitled "Cupid at Home." The Melnotte Twins, two handsome and talented girls, and Clay Smith, a clever and amusing comedian, will appear in a singing and dancing sketch which they term "Artistic Nonsense," and Hawthorne and Burt, two song and dance comedians, will create lots of fun. Gordon and Marx, the diverting Dutch drolls, will return for next week, which will be the last of Lillian Mortimer and Co., who will present the diverting comedietta, "The Arrival of Betty." The Four Amatis Sisters and the beautiful Grigolati's Aerial Ballet will finish their engagement with this bill.

"Alabama" at Ye Liberty

Next week the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will offer "Alabama," the earliest, and probably the most popular of all Augustus Thomas' successes. Since the piece was first presented, nearly twenty years ago, by that notable cast which included J. H. Stoddard, E. M. Holland, Harry Woodruff, Reuben Fax, Maurice Barrymore and May Brooklyn, its popularity has been unbounded and seems to increase as times goes on. Thomas is regarded by many as the greatest of the present day American dramatists, and it is probable that this is due to his faculty for instilling into his plays a touch of genuine American interest. "Alabama" is a distinctly American play, and a great one at that, presenting a true and vivid picture of the south shortly after the civil war and during the period of reconstruction. The scenes are laid in the State from which the play takes its name, and in this interesting period, amid picturesque surroundings, an appealing story of gripping heart interest is unfolded. The characters are all true to tradition and there are enough of them to make "Alabama" a splendid vehicle for an evenly balanced stock company. An attractive scenic production will be provided and all the favorites will be found in the cast. "Alabama" has not been seen in Oakland for a good many years, and for that reason alone it should call out good audiences. "The Prisoner of Zenda" will follow.

Burton Holmes Travelogues

No more satisfactory substitute for personal travel can be imagined than the series of Burton Holmes' Travelogues now being delivered in Christian Science Hall. These are finely illustrated talks given by Mr. Wright Kramer, who, with Mr. Holmes, has been journeying for years to the far corners of the earth to bring back to America all that is picturesque and interesting. Mr. Kramer is an actor of repute, formerly associated with Mrs. Pat Campbell in both her English and American tours, and was the originator in the leading roles of "The Road to Yesterday," "The Stolen Story" and "The Round Up." He has become a second self to Mr. Holmes, and it is a treat to listen to his delivery of the lectures, given word for word as they are given in the east. Either the talk or the views, wonderfully tinted and motion pictures would be a feast by itself. Berlin is the subject for this Thursday and Friday evenings and Saturday afternoon. On these dates Mr. Holmes will give novel and realistic impressions of the kaiser and his people, the street life, military parades, pleasures and industries. You may visit the port of Hamburg and watch the German army, and follow the emperor about the city on his daily round of pleasure and duty. On next Monday and Tuesday evenings and Wednesday afternoon Mr. Holmes will take you to Vienna, the Kaiserstadt, today the most grandiose of European cities. You may follow the Viennese into their parks and Prater, to their lovely lake district, to the summer home of the emperor and into the glorious Alps. On the following Thursday and Friday evenings and Saturday afternoon, "Gay Paris" is the itinerary. Fashions may interest the ladies, but there are also the lively streets and the thronging cafes full of French life and vivacity. London is the program for Monday and Tuesday evenings and Wednesday afternoon of the third week, and amongst other sights and scenes of this great and rich city there are the international horse show and the thrilling Grand National Steeplechase to be viewed. For the last of this series of Travelogues, Fez, the unique Moorish metropolis of Morocco has been selected, and the lawless plains of that almost unknown country and the strange life of a city wonderful in its isolation and decay will prove both novel and fascinating. Seats on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s at $1.00, 75 cents and 50 cents.

Hoyt's "Texas Steer"

The last performances of the spectacular historical comedy-drama, "If I Were King," will be given at the Valencia Theatre this Sunday afternoon and evening. On Monday night Charles H. Hoyt's ever welcome "A Texas Steer" will be presented for the first time in San Francisco by a stock company. The spirit of real comedy pervades all of this author's plays and in "A Texas Steer" that humor which was particularly his own is shown at its best. The story of the bluff Texan, Maverick Brander, elected against his will from a Texas district to Congress, the mark for grafters, office seekers and society sycophants, until he finally decides to be his own master and control the situation instead of being controlled, is familiar to theatregoers. It is to Hoyt's great credit that the situations, characterizations and dialogue of "A Texas Steer" are as fresh today as when first offered. The immortal Texan trio, Major Yell, Brassy Gall and Colonel Bragg are as amusing as ever.

the pathetic persistence of Fishbeck, whose hopes to become Minister to Dahomey are rudely dispelled when once he reaches the capitol, has the same appeal.

A Great Minstrel Show

"When the Minstrels Come to Town" it is a signal for a general jollification and the advent of I. P. Wilkerson's "Minstrels of Today" at the American Theatre has certainly marked an epoch in the history of amusement-loving San Francisco. Not since the good old days of Emerson and Reed at the Standard Theatre on Bush street has so clever an aggregation of burnt cork performers, bright comedians and sweet singers been gathered together in this city and large and delighted audiences are the rule at every performance. The musical comedy, "About Town," which follows the minstrel entertainment, is of a high order of excellence and the talented leading people and score of pretty girls that are included in the cast form a pleasing contrast to the first half of Mr. Wilkerson's offering. At the matinee this Sunday, which begins the second week of an undoubtedly prosperous season, many novelties will be offered by the principal comedians. Al. Jolson, John King and Emil Subers. Jolson, who is unquestionably one of the most versatile funmakers before the public, comes of Russian parentage and possesses the gift of mind reading to a marked degree. He has made mental telepathy a lifelong study and promises to give some remarkable demonstrations of his wonderful powers during the coming week. He and the other end men will tell a lot of new stories, and Matt Keefe, Will Oakland, Tell Taylor and Frank Figoni, the ballad singers of the organization, will be heard in a change of selections while a noted Australian baritone, direct from J. C. Williamson's theatres, will be heard for the first time in this country, singing "California for Mine," the stirring number which brings the first part to a close. All of the song hits in "About Town" will be continued, notably "Six Little Girls and Me," "I'm Looking for a Sweetheart," the "Hornpipe Rag," "I Want to go Back to Good Old U. S. A." and "Der Faderland for Mine." The critics are unanimous in proclaiming "Six Little Girls and Me" the prettiest song bit heard here since the Floradora Sextette. It has a lilt and melody absolutely bewitching. The costumes in "About Town," by the way, are as bright and fresh as the girls wearing them.

A Monster Benefit Performance

Theatregoers of San Francisco and vicinity are eagerly awaiting the eighth benefit in aid of the charity fund of the Associated Theatrical Managers, to take place at the Princess Theatre next Tuesday afternoon at precisely half past one. Aside from the deserving character of the benefit, the program to be given will go down in the amusement annals of the city and when the curtain finally descends just in time to let you get home for dinner an entertainment will have been offered worth fully five times the admission price. The performance will be, as is always the custom, continuous, and will be opened by I. P. Wilkerson's "Minstrels of Today," from the American Theatre, in their brilliant first part, replete with clever comedy and good singing. Mme. Nazimova and her capable company from the Van Ness will contribute a bit of Ibsen, and the two splendid stock companies from the Alcazar and Valencia will enter into friendly competition with their respective renditions of the school scene from Barrie's delightful "Quality Street" and the dinner scene from Hoyt's "A Texas Steer." The talented principals and chorus of the Princess Musical Comedy Company will present the best parts of "A Chinese Honeymoon" and jolly May Boley will be seen in one of her inimitable specialties. The very best talent from the vaudeville world, including Mrs. Horton Forrest Phipps, the Kermess dancer, will be supplied from the Orpheum, and Arthur Cunningham, than whom there is no more popular singer in San Francisco and who has just returned from a starring tour in "Kerry Gow" and

AL. JOLSON

One of the many funmakers of the "Minstrels of Today" at the American

"Shaun Rhue," will sing the prologue to I'Pagliacci and other selections. A number of peculiar interest will be the rendition of Tennyson's "The Lady of Shalott" which has been given a charming musical setting by Al Elkus and which will be read and sung by Miss Alice Colman, accompanied by the composer. Will Greenbaum is going to help out the cause by contributing "Ten Minutes in Berlin," one of the best portions of the Burton Holmes' Travelogues, will be several distinct surprises on the program and the overture, by the combined orchestras of the city, will be a rouser. Seats are going with a rush at the Princess box office and standing room will undoubtedly be at a premium.

Madame Nazimova will give her final performances of "A Doll's House" at the Van Ness this Saturday afternoon and night.

"Sporting Life," which will follow "A Texas Steer" at the Valencia Theatre, will be a production of the very first magnitude. Over one hundred and fifty people will be used on the stage and one of the features will be the introduction of nearly a dozen horses from a well-known racing stable in the racing scene. The prize fight will be another bit of realism, a prominent eastern pugilist having been engaged for the play, and nothing will be left undone to make the production a red-letter one in the history of the Valencia.

A Get-Together Dinner

Seated around a table in the form of the letter C, the State initial, decorated in green and gold, the members of the working committees of the California Promotion Committee gathered at a subscription business dinner in the Colonial ball room of the St. Francis on Thursday evening, April 22nd. It was one of the famous "get-together" occasions, designed for receiving the reports of the various committees and for the presentation of ideas for a further broadening of the work, and the "bear" flag and the California poppy boutonnieres of the members were the badge and great seal of the occasion. "Co-operation" and "unity of action" were pass words of enthusiasm, as the different speakers brought forward the various phases of results achieved and these they hope to see brought about through co-operation. The close connection between the metropolis and the interior was emphasized in the speech of Rufus P. Jennings, who, after a brief outline of some of the accomplishments of the Promotion Committee, introduced Zoeth E. Eldredge, chairman of the Reception Committee, as presiding officer of the evening. The part played by the Reception Committee in entertaining visitors to the State and bringing together the business men of California and carrying out the ideas of sub-committees was set forth by Mr. Eldredge. A. L. Nares spoke for the Colonization Committee, who reviewed the growth of California during the seven years of the Committee's existence and showed by comparison of figures its effect. The encouragement of the subdivision of large tracts of land and the bringing of desirable immigrants formed the theme of his discourse, with a study of the immigration laws and the necessity for considering alterations to suit the conditions which will arise when the Panama Canal is completed. Frederick H. Meyer, chairman of the Committee on Conventions, presented a comprehensive plan for bringing conventions to the State, outlining methods for raising a fund and for the distribution of it to the best advantage. He enumerated the list of conventions already secured by his committee, those likely yet to be brought hither and those bodies with whom correspondence has been carried on but which, for various reasons were not in a position to consider California at present. How California has been advertised during the year was told in the report of the Literary Committee, presented by Dr. Clarence E. Edwards, chief of the bureau. Briefly he capitulated the work, showing that more than a hundred and fifty million articles were circulated at a value, if paid for in advertising space rates, of $500,000. The visit of the One Hundred Californians to the A. Y. P. Exposition was the theme on which Frank L. Brown dilated, and it was urged by him and seconded enthusiastically by the assemblage that the community at large lend every effort towards the beneficial ends designed for the good of the whole State in this excursion.

Three of Charles Frohman's stars, John Drew, Ethel Barrymore and Marie Doro will follow each other at the Van Ness Theatre, presenting their latest successes.

Grace Travers, the pretty, painstaking and talented member of the Valencia stock company, is slowly but surely forging her way to the front. Her work as Huguette de Hamel in "If I Were King" stamps her as possessing vast ability and those who applaud her in the part can hardly realize that she has been upon the stage but a little over six months.

John Drew in his latest success "Jack Straw" will be seen at the Van Ness Theatre late this month. It is spoken of as the strongest hit of Drew's brilliantly successful career.

Down the coast to Los Angeles, thence across the Sagebrush State of Oregon, on to Seattle to the exposition, from there to Montana, then through the Yellowstone, Denver, Utah and back to the Golden Gate. That is the itinery of the next big tour to be made by M. W. Levy, the well-known San Francisco millionaire in his famous combination sleeping-touring Studebaker "forty." Already Levy has covered the greater portion of the western continent in his car, but he has been resting for sometime now and on his coming trip will be gone the entire summer. He will be accompanied by members of his family and his chauffeur, Sam Marshall.

H. C. Warwick has returned from a trip to Santa Cruz in his Chalmers-Detroit "40." This tour is becoming popular with motorists both for its good roads and the diversified scenery which it affords. Continued to Del Monte it forms an ideal week-end tour. On the round trip but a small part of the distance is traversed twice, and the road passes by sea, valley, mountain and river, all at their best at this time of the year. Fields of golden poppies alternate with orchards in full blossom until the traveler feels that he is rolling through one vast garden.

Mr. Andy Mahony of the Olson-Mahony Lumber Company, who recently took delivery from the Howard Automobile Company of a 40 horsepower Buick touring car, had a delightful run last week, the party being made up of Mr. and Mrs. Mahony and daughter, and Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Cobby and son. The entire distance covered was 700 miles and was accomplished with an average gasoline consumption of eighteen and a quarter miles to the gallon. The route taken was Santa Rosa to Healdsburg, thence through Calistoga and St. Helena to Vallejo, thence to Merced and Modesto via Livermore, over the Pacheco Pass to Hollister and returning through San Juan and San Jose. Except from Banta to Modesto where deep mud was encountered, Mr. Mahony reports all the roads in splendid condition.

"While we have experienced a steady demand for touring cars," says Jack Fagal, manager of the Studebaker Bros. automobile department, "we have been surprised by the number of limousine cars that we have sold during the past few months. Sales in this type of car have almost equalled those of the touring and suburban types. My predictions early in January that this would be a big year for the industry are certainly becoming facts."

F. L. DuBroy, Pacific Coast representative of the Olds Motor Works, spent Saturday in San Francisco en route to Seattle. Mr. DuBroy reports the Pacific Coast business up to the present time fully thirty per cent larger than the entire season last year. The Pioneer Automobile Company reports having placed orders with Mr. DpBroy for four carloads of Olds to come forward as soon as possible.

William J. Gallagher of this city has joined the ranks of motorists during the past week by becoming the owner of a Studebaker limousine.

R. L. Burnham, the enthusiastic amateur, who made such a good showing with his Chalmers-Detroit "40" in the recent hill climb, has entered his machine in the Santa Rosa road race. Mr. Burnham declares that his speedy car will be among the closest contestors for the big trophy. The car will be driven by Ivan de Jough.

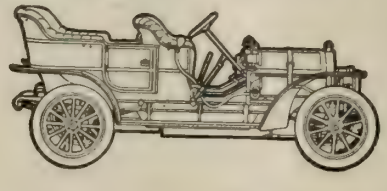
A CHANCE FOR ALL

How a Few Dollars Invested Now Will Give Any Man a Start in the Great West—People Want Land. They Realize There Never Was But One Crop and There Never Will be Another

There are thousands of acres of good agricultural land left in the western states that can be purchased for nearly nothing. The firm of H. B. Sanders & Co., Judge Building, Salt Lake City, Utah, have an option on over a quarter of a million acres that they are offering at $2.95 an acre. This land is scattered all over the state of Nevada and there is lots of it that will grow crops without irrigation. Some of it adjoins towns and can be used as additions to townsites. Other pieces especially that lying adjacent to rivers and creeks would make excellent fruit land.

The above land was selected 25 years ago when the entry man had his choice of all the lands of the state. H. B. Sanders & Co. furnish a catalogue of these lands free upon application. The above firm make a specialty of lands. They can sell you Timber Lands in the Northwest, Oil Lands in California or Utah, Fruit Lands, Irrigated Lands, or Agricultural Lands in any Western State. They make a specialty of State Lands, Railroad Lands, Land Scrip and Land Grants. They secure control of large tracts and sell at small profits. The above firm has secured all the irrigated lands of the Green River Valley Land & Water Co. The largest Carey Act withdrawal of Fruit Lands in the United States. Any person wishing to make an investment in Western Lands should certainly write the above firm.

THE CHARACTER OF YOUR CAR



Depends largely upon its makers. The owner of a STUDEBAKER-GARFORD is its staunchest friend, because he knows that every detail of his machine has been made from the finest material and with the greatest mechanical skill—that, sixty years of experience in carriage building has enabled the Studebaker concern to put out a machine, which, in its entirety, represents the highest type of automobile efficiency. These qualities have reached their highest development in the Models "C" and "D" of the STUDEBAKER-GARFORDS.

THOMAS FLYER

This is the car that elicits pleased comments whenever it passes on the street.

Almost any dealer can talk SPEED or STYLE or STRENGTH about his car; but when the Thomas Flyer is mentioned, all three of these terms are used with equal force.

QUESTION—Why do all agents compare their automobiles to the Thomas?

Our answer—We are the only ones in our native land that had faith enough in our car to run it around the world.

A BIG TIP, $3,500,000.00—If everybody used a Thomas there would be no necessity of spending $3,500,000 for good roads.

All roads are good for a Thomas. Does anybody believe the roads are paved from New York to Paris? If so, try it.

Her Last Novel

Despite its modern—and largely American—setting, Elinor Macartney Lane's "Katrine" carries with it the atmosphere of the days of chivalry. Dermott McDermott, lawyer, financier and man of fashion would have graced the laces and velvets and plumes of the seventeenth century cavalier. "An Irishman, with black hair, very black brows, pale, like a Spaniard, about thirty, who rides like a trooper, drinks half a glass of whisky at a gulp, and is the greatest liar I can imagine," is the way Mrs. Ravenel described him to her son, and for the rest of him, the verse he loved to sing to himself:

War-battered dogs are we,
  Fighters in every clime,
Fillers of trench and grave,
  Mockers be-mocked by time.
War dogs, hungry and gray
  Gnawing a naked bone,
Fighting in every clime
  Every cause but our own.

Dermott McDermott easily displaces Frank Ravenel as hero of the romance though Ravenel both saves his fortune and wins Katrine. It is not he, re-entering his ancestral mansion with his accepted bride, but Dermott, deliberately setting light to the accumulated evidence which would have left Frank without name or other inheritance, and then going into the stock exchange to make his rival's financial fight, that goes forward with us after we have read the last page. Dermott, splendidly reckless, romantically loyal, true to his creed: "The thing to do is to show a brave front always! Never let the world know you're downed in anything. So carry all off with a laugh and a song. Plant flowers on the graves, flowers for the world to see, and for the great Power above as well, that He may know we are not whining—that we're down here doing the best we can." And of Dermott's lies it will be well to say that, gifted with imagination, he could not resist embroidering the truth, but no one was ever the worse for his exaggerations and in business matters he adhered to facts. Katrine was the daughter of the dissipated Irish overseer of the Ravenel plantation in North Carolina, a girl in years—a woman in the experience of hardship and sorrow. Dermott's deep love for her had begun when she was a veritable child. Katrine was doubly gifted with beauty and voice. She had temperament, ambition, industry, but she is best described in the words of Ravenel—"She is so square." And Ravenel, the third corner of the "inevitable triangle"—young, wealthy and irresistible, had back of him the traditions of the men of his family. Handsome men all, they had ridden gaily through life, taking what they listed for their own. Of exertion, outside of what secured them pleasure, they knew nothing. Frank Ravenel came, saw, conquered, but was conquered in turn. He could not ask what she would not yield and it was the pride of the Ravenels that they never made misalliances. Before they married they considered all they owed to ancestry and posterity and Katrine despite all else in her favor, was but the child of a disreputable, penniless Irish overseer, soon to die and leave her alone in the world. Frank Ravenel may have been a cad in his treatment of Katrine but he was no scoundrel, and if incidents are to be judged not singly and apart but in their relation to life, the barren love making of those summer months furnished Katrine what is said to be the mainspring of music, a great sorrow, and aroused in Ravenel an interest in realities which made him a man. Of the events of a past generation which gave Dermott McDermott an added motive to his opposition to Ravenel, it is just as well not to inquire too closely into the course of "law honesty" pursued by Ravenel's father. To be sure, all those immediately affected had died, and Katrine's generosity, second, if that, to Dermott's, would have protected Ravenel from scandal and despoilment, but the early French marriage, the desertion of wife and child to poverty and dishonor, the concealment of the whole transaction, and the precautionary American divorce obtained in a community where neither party had ever claimed residence without any sort of notification to the wife, does not bear on the face of it an intimation of good faith. The initiative claim that the French marriage, being civil and therefore not acceptable to the Catholic church authorities, was too irregular to be strictly legal, hardly seems well put forward, for it is the civic, not the ecclesiastical ceremony which is obligatory and moreover, with a cure as one of the witnesses, it could not be said that the church had not tacitly sanctioned if it had not approved. But the romantic purpose was served—that of bringing the prideful Ravenel to his knees, of giving Katrine an opportunity to forgive and forget and understand, and the force of the romance is sufficient to carry readers past considerations of probabilities. Elinor Macarthey Lane died after a brief illness while her book was in press. Published by the Harpers.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Petaluma—(1) Yes, it is true that a bookseller in San Francisco was arrested for keeping a copy of the Decameron in stock. It is also true that a police magistrate of this enlightened city found him guilty of dealing in indecent literature. (2) No, the local authorities have not interdicted the sale of the Bible, but it is safe to say that we have a police magistrate who doesn't know what it contains.

Inquirer—Yes, it has been said that Mr. Roosevelt shot a man in the back during the Spanish war. But it has since been said that he even shot a gazelle in Africa. You can't believe all the mean things that are said about Mr. Roosevelt.

Old Sport—If you are an old sport you should be "wise," as they say in the vernacular, to the "frame-up" (which is also of the vernacular). The sporting editor is the prize-fight promoter's best friend. He is skilled in the art of exciting the expectation of the damphool public. A match between Jeffries and Johnson was a foregone conclusion as soon as the colored man returned to America. Jeffries is as likely to get into his old condition as Sullivan was when that broken down pug fought Corbett in New Orleans, or as Corbett was when he was matched to fight Jeffries.

THE GREATER DANGER

"Tell me, O ancient mariner,
If ship or sky or sea,
Or land of all the lands that are,
Be half so fair as she?"

"Truly, O youth, she is more fair
Than sky or sea or shore;
But in the time of storm have care;
Fear these, but fear her more!"

ABSENT MINDED

"You have three pairs of glasses, Professor?"

"Yes, I use one to read with, one to see at a distance, and the third to find the other two."

AN OPPORTUNITY

Young Wife—My dear, the dressmaker is here with her bill. Won't you be so good—

(The husband gives her the amount, grumbling)—And as we aren't indebted to her any more, why couldn't I just order a new dress?

AN INTELLIGENT SERVANT

The Mistress—Who hung the thermometer to the ceiling?

The Servant—I, ma'am. You were complaining because it was so low!

The Astronomer—An auto would take five hundred years to reach that star.

Merchant—And how much gasoline?

Blames it on Puritanism

According to the New York World there is talk of prosperity everywhere in this broad and enlightened land but it is not justified by conditions. Assurances of industrial and commercial revival are heard on all sides, but business depression is everywhere apparent and recruits are swelling the ranks of the unemployed in every State in the Union. The good old times before the Roosevelt panic are bound to return again, but not until the effects of the devastating spasm of ostentatious morality induced by the intrepid Prophet have worn off and conditions have adjusted themselves to the new order of things. As the World points out "occupations, social customs and business practices long approved or tolerated have been interdicted with an austerity rarely manifested except in the presence of recognized crime," and the effect has been widespread, making itself felt in almost every channel of commercial activity. Railroad interests have suffered a loss of $300,000,000. Prohibition has destroyed property to the value of hundreds of millions and thrown thousands of people out of work and business. Puritanism inspired with solicitude for the American soul, zealous for the development of an ascetic temperament, has been revolutionizing social as well as commercial conditions, reducing the joys of living and increasing the miseries of existence. The World ascribes our industrial and commercial depression in a great measure to the sudden development of a burning passion for spiritual perfection, and asks if we may not well doubt "whether to make a solitude and call it reform is exactly the right way to go about it." The World is an incorrigible old voluptuary that has yet to learn that food and raiment are the unimportant luxuries of existence. True bliss is attained through the medium of an easy conscience on an empty stomach.

Discretionary Humanity

The wife of a juror in the Calhoun case was injured in a street car accident and was taken to a hospital. As soon as the hospital authorities learned who she was they informed the Sheriff and the Sheriff called Judge Lawlor on the telephone. The Sheriff, of course, wanted to know what he should do. Should he tell the juror that his wife had been hurt? Would it be "legal" to permit the juror to see his wife? Would it be necessary to include the entire jury in the visit to the hospital? How often would the juror be permitted to sit by the bedside of his wife if the court, in its discretion, saw fit to grant the permission? These and other questions were transmitted to Judge Lawlor by the Sheriff, and Judge Lawlor, after taking the matter under advisement in banc with himself, finally told the Sheriff that he saw nothing illegal or even improper in permitting the juror to visit his injured wife—in custody of a deputy sheriff. Then the juror was informed that his wife had been injured and that she was in the hospital, and that the court had granted him the privilege of visiting her—in the custody of a deputy sheriff. The juror was duly grateful; he had not imagined that he was entitled to any consideration whatever; if the court could deprive him of his liberty, interfere with his pursuit of happiness, and impugn his honor as a citizen, it could also deny him the privilege of giving comfort and consolation to a stricken wife. But the court had relaxed its stern decree in response to the cry of common humanity. The juror could see his wife—in the custody of a deputy sheriff. Yes, indeed, this court was almost human. At the door of the hospital the juror and deputy sheriff were met by the doctor who informed them that in his jurisdiction the court order did not run; the juror could see his wife, but the deputy sheriff must stay outside. When a husband came to see his sick wife in that hospital he came as a free man. Wives of jurors were not excepted from the rule of the institution, and their lives must not be endangered by the nervous shock almost inevitable upon the presence of a deputy sheriff and the knowledge that their husbands were "in custody." So the deputy sheriff had to relinquish his custody of that juror, quite contrary to the form and force of the statute in such cases made and provided. Fortunately, Judge Lawlor accepted the situation without protest, and the deputy sheriff will not suffer for his "discretion." Neither will the juror be disqualified or reprimanded for disobeying the order of the court. It must be that there is a law higher than the "discretion" of the court over which Judge Lawlor presides. And, on suggestion by the attorneys for the defense, who are more concerned over the "state of mind" of this juror than are any of the parties of this action, the juror may see his wife as frequently as he wishes. It must not be forgotten, however, that this is an extreme case. Thus far the rule of the court has been relaxed only to permit a juror to bow to his friend in the street or across the rail of the jury-box; and now a precedent has been established whereby a juror whose wife is in a hospital may call upon her in the custody of the Sheriff as far as the door of the hospital, beyond which the jurisdiction of the court does not extend. It is all very absurd; it is also very unjust and very pitiful; it also compels the reflection that it is very unfortunate that the case is not on trial before Judge Van Fleet who remarked from the bench the other day that he considered it an outrage for a judge to impugn the honesty of jurors by locking them up.

The Banqueting of Brooks

Our civic patriots paid vociferous homage one night last week to Professor John Graham Brooks, a renowned muckraker of the bema who came to town as the inspiration and the oriflamme of the League of Justice, and who was hailed as one of the innumerable centres of a people's hope. The appearance of Professor John Graham Brooks in our midst was timely; that is to say it was scheduled for psychological effect. In other words Professor John Graham Brooks was precipitated upon us with deliberation and characteristic design in the midst of the tedious trial now dragging its slow length along in the august presence of Judge William P. Lawlor. The professor was sprung upon us as a reminder that while we are still in the throes of a moral unlift, we are nevertheless wallowing in corruption, stewing in the fetid atmosphere of social and political degradation. He came to fillip the civic conscience and to suggestionize public sentiment for the beneficent purposes and noble designs that inspire the self-sacrificing reformers who have consecrated themselves to the cause of municipal regeneration. Considering the virtuous object of the Brooks visitation we have no reason to be proud of the feeble demonstration in his honor. The carnal banquet was palatable enough but the feast of reason and flow of soul was a perfunctory and far from creditable affair. It was not at all what might reasonably have been expected in view of the preliminary booming done by the serviceable and ever alert Professor Boke, head, front, blood and arteries of the League of Justice. Be it said to Professor Boke's credit that he labored unremittingly and with prodigious zeal as the press-agent of this timely and nobly inspired function. He communicated far and wide with prominent citizens, informing them that the League of Justice would be glad to have them as guests on the auspicious occasion. It was but necessary for a distinguished citizen to signify his willingness to partake of a free feed and the invitation would be forthcoming. But such is the shameful apathy of this community that, with few exceptions, gratifying responses came only from the small-fry of public and private life. A few judges noted for their absorbing passion for being all things to all men were on hand and were properly edified with a few choice insults hurled at the Bench by the chaste ornament of the cause of civic decency, the Hon. Francis J. Heney. If the banquet lacked dignity and distinction, however, it must be recorded that an elevated moral purpose and an exultation in standing for the right and defying the powers of evil were strikingly present.

The Penalty of Obscurity

While hastening to affirm our dissatisfaction with the colorless quality of citizenship that was paraded by Professor Boke and his League on the occasion of the Brooks banquet we feel that on behalf of the community it should be explained that the poor showing was the result rather of the ignorance than of the prejudice that prevails among our fellow citizens. The fact is that very few of us knew anything about Professor John Graham Brooks prior to the heralding of his rescue expedition by Professor Boke. When Professor Boke began rounding us up for his free feed the average man was less concerned about the modest angel of the enterprise than about the personality and record of the motif. Who in h—— is Professor John Graham Brooks? was the pertinent question propounded by that incredible though credulous individual the average citizen. Even the potent lure of a free feed was not sufficient to hasten the donning of glad rags while there was a prospect of a default of distinction in the pretext for a social function. Professor Boke was obliged to make reply that Professor John Graham Brooks was a man after his own heart and calibre, a college professor who finds idealism very easy and toleration of existing conditions very difficult; a militant reformer who recks not where his words fall so long as they are true and right. Professor Boke vouchsafed the additional information that Professor John Graham Brooks' principal claim to distinction was in the form of a book called "The Social Unrest" which would some day be read and perhaps digested. There was nothing more to be said on the subject of Professor John Graham Brooks; not even by the voluble Professor Boke. Consequently many distinguished citizens who should have been on hand to welcome Professor John Graham Brooks with honest joy remained at home under the misapprehension that he was a bore.

His Curious Message

Like the average citizen we had no acquaintance with Professor John Graham Brooks until last week, and we regret to say that we came to know him through so unsavory a medium as the Boughten Bulletin. This circumstance, however, should not be construed to his disparagement. It was simply his misfortune that the bawd of journalism was the only paper that saw fit to publish his speech. From this speech we learn that the professor is a fine and hearty muckraker, a reformer on the trail of the minions of the debauched and relentless corruptionists. What the professor says reads well next day. He thunders at spooks and windmills with much force and some eloquence, occasionally burgeoning into light and airy platitudes. The professor is very proud that he is a reformer and he makes it clear that he has persuaded himself that as the world is greatly indebted to reformers some day the world will be greatly indebted to Professor John Graham Brooks. He points with pride to the fact that Emerson and Lincoln were reformers, thus insinuating that the inference must follow as the night the day that he is possessed of the attributes and fired by the zeal that distinguished some of the most illustrious patriots in American history. From all that the professor said at the banquet and from what he did not say it is reasonable to conclude that his self-felicitation is grounded in the theory that the passion for innovation must always be regarded as praiseworthy. Evidently it has not occurred to him that reform to be effective should be temperate. Doubtless he has never pondered the observation of Burke, "It cannot too often be repeated until it comes into the currency of a proverb 'to innovate is not to reform.'" It is apparent that Professor John Graham Brooks has a passion for innovation.

but no very clear comprehension of the things that should be innovated or of the things that should be substituted for the elements of the existing order. There are wrong-doers in this Republic, therefore we should change our form of government. This is the logic of Professor John Graham Brooks. Some judges are corrupt, therefore we should organize leagues of justice to coerce our courts and inject mob sentiment into the jury-box. This also is the logic of Professor John Graham Brooks. New democratic devices have been introduced in recent years; some have already proved a failure, others have not yet been fairly tested, but Professor John Graham Brooks, the apostle of the New Democracy points to all of them with gratification, insisting that they must be accepted as evidence of progress toward perfection. What an amazing oracle, how bewildering a philosopher is this learned professor! We are living under a mixed form of government the minor evils of which are easily to be traced to the concessions that were made by the Founders to the partisans of Democracy; but Professor John Graham Brooks tells us that to eradicate these evils me must adopt newer and more radical democratic principles. And in his impatience of contradiction and opposition he solemnly affirms that as he and his followers are making the fight for decent citizenship not to be in sympathy with him is to be in favor of corruption. A charming controversialist is Professor John Graham Brooks, worthy of the highest esteem of the ladies and gentlemen of the League of Justice, entitled to a certificate of character from either the Hon. Francis J. Heney or the picturesque Professor Boke. A gentleman and a scholar is Professor John Graham Brooks, whose statements will bear every test except that of being confronted with reality; a pedagogue of profound erudition who has yet to develop a prudent distrust of his own infallibility. How typical of medieval bigotry is this twentieth century soldier of human progress, who, having made up the faggot of his beliefs insists that his own system is absolutely right and that whatever differs from it is anathema maranatha.

Poster Art

By Arthur Swan

Contrasted here in two groups of pictures is the genius of France and America for artistic and symbolic expression in the language of lines. This interesting study was made possible by the exhibition of posters at the Hopkins Art Institute and the recent reproduction in La Vie Illustree of pictures that were exhibited last month in Paris. In each group is the art typical of the country in which the pictures were designed and executed. In this country the highest quality of poster art is employed principally for the purposes of magazine publishers. In France painters of the first rank are employed by commercial houses to design attractive and humorous advertisements, and the deadwalls of Paris are covered with many beautiful pictures. In this country there is much complaint respecting the ugliness of our dead-wall advertisements. In Paris, according to La Vie Illustree, beautiful comic posters relieve the dull monotony of gray walls. The poster art says the same journal belongs to our practical epoch. The artist has come to work for the plain people. He embodies ideas in posters for the edification and amusement of the multitude. "Times have changed greatly since the days of Murger," say the French journalist; "Bohemia has become wise. The painters—nearly all of them pay their rents regularly, and when the landlord enters the atelier of his tenant it is not for the purpose of brandishing his unpaid bill after the manner of M. Vantour. Nowadays the landlords of Paris visit the ateliers to order wonder posters that will extol the goods which they have to sell—either wholesale or retail." According to La Vie Illustree some of the most prosperous and most famous artists of Paris are poster painters. Chief among them is Capiello noted for his exuberant fancy, his wonderful color schemes and the satire and humor of his designs. A. Barriere is another prominent poster-painter. He has made the mural placard one of the most charming manifestations of modern French art. Grun is another. He is said to be a wizard of the brush, a virtuoso of color. His posters are so characteristic that they would be known by all Paris even without his signature. His specialty is the gay Parisienne. "Hurrying along the boulevard to a business rendezvous," says the French reviewer, "absorbed in agitating reverie, with knitted brows and savage looks, your head crammed with figures, suddenly you stop, your features soften, your eye lights up,—what causes the transformation? It is a Parisienne by Grun that inspires the smile in which your countenance is wreathed, and despite the passers-by who jostle you and the rain that begins to fall you stand open-mouthed, charmed by the graceful apparition. The fact is that Grun's posters are a joy to the eye of the profane, a delicious surprise to the artist. Upon a background generally sombre, sometimes black, women slender and enchanting rise out of the tonality sometimes bold but always admirably blended." Grun may be all right in Paris but were his pictures to be exhibited on the dead walls of a free, enlightened and of course puritanical American city somebody would be arrested for outraging the proprieties. American poster art is more sedate than the poster art of France. All American art is under the tyranny of public opinion, and the loss to American art is considerable.

Suggestions Concerning the Most Effective Method of Maintaining and Vindicating the National Honor When it Is Impugned by the Subjects or Citizens of Other Nations as the Turks Have Apparently Done.

By Democritus

We seem to have forgotten that two American missionaries were murdered in Asia Minor during the recent massacres at Adana and contiguous places. It is possible that these missionaries were not murdered, but as we have heard nothing to the contrary since the first report, we must assume that the report was true. But we seem to have forgotten all about it. Possibly our State Department is attending to the matter. If so, the intentions of the Department must be a profound State secret, for we have not heard a word from that cryptic section of the Government since it was announced that two American citizens had been slain in cold blood by the fanatical Moslems.

I am at a loss to fix the blame for this tragedy. The Government is not to blame, because the Government took every diplomatic precaution to protect these citizens resident of Turkey; the citizens themselves are not to blame, because they had a right under our treaty with the Ottoman Empire to live in Turkey; and nowhere in that treaty was there a provision that they would be compelled to die there. By this process of elimination I arrive at the conclusion that if anybody is to blame for the murder of these missionaries it must have been the people who murdered them. It can be no excuse on behalf of the Mohammedans that they objected to the preaching and teaching of the missionaries. Our diplomats had fixed that matter entirely aside from the wishes or prejudices of the Moslems. The American missionary was granted a treaty right not only to worship his God after the dictates of his conscience, but to persuade everybody in Turkey to worship the same God. The civic status of the missionary was clearly defined and it was supposed that it would be maintained not only by the American consul, but by the American gunboat.

Seemingly, the American consul has been derelict and the American gunboat has been ineffective. Our missionaries have been murdered by the Turk and apparently that is to be the end of it, unless, perchance, after the Young Turks get a good grip on the Government of Turkey, our State Department shall demand an indemnity of a few thousand sequins for the missionaries. In truth, there does not appear to be any other way out of it. Our State Department might also demand the punishment of the murderers, but of what practical avail would that be? In the first place it is not likely that the actual murder could be fixed on individuals, and in the second place if our State Department should demand the punishment of every Turk in Adana and the other places where these massacres occurred, the other nations would cry out against the wholesale reprisal.

Perhaps the best way would be to recall all our missionaries from Turkey. Evidently they are not doing much good in that barbarous land. On the contrary it is evident that they are provocative of much harm not only to themselves, but to everybody else. They arouse the prejudices of the people who own the country; they imbroil or threaten to imbroil the nations in bloody strife, and they are a constant source of expense to the Sunday schools and churches of America. A vast amount of worry and trouble would be avoided if the missionary in Turkey would come home.

As far as I can ascertain, the only person in Turkey that has the slightest inclination toward American Christianity is the Armenian. Even as a Moslem the Armenian is a disagreeable citizen; when he is converted to Christianity he becomes unbearable. He is a usurer in business and a disturbing element in politics. He is a malcontent, a seditious subject, a conspirator and a rebel. When he becomes a Christian upon the American plan the Armenian is worse than he was before. He insists upon "certain inalienable rights" which he defines as "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," and he attempts to impose this Occidental doctrine upon an Oriental despotism. The Armenian is an anachronism in Turkey; he would be an undesirable citizen in America.

I am convinced that it is not primarily the intention of the Turkish religious fanatics to kill American missionaries. The recent massacres in that country were directed at the Armenian Christians. It was probably a fortuitious misfortune that the missionaries were lost in the riotous shuffle. When fanatics are slaying right and left it is difficult for them to discriminate the nationality of those who oppose them or against whom they are opposed. In this instance, no doubt, it was enough for the Moslems to know that those whom they put to the sword were not of the true faith.

It has been the same in all countries and in all ages. Even among Christians who are taught to do unto others as they would have others do unto them, there have been massacres for the greater glory of the God of the particular sect of those promoting the massacre. Persecution has always characterized religious propaganda of every kind. The only reason that we don't persecute our religious adversaries in America is because the churches are not powerful enough the one against the other, and because there is a very large proportion of the people who are not communicants of the churches. There are persecutions, however, in this land of liberty aside from religious persecution; there is rank injustice, and cruel oppression, and much accusation without proof. Our laws are strong enough to prevent massacres, but they are not always sufficient to protect the weak against the powerful or to render exact justice between man and man. If it were not for the checks that are upon us we would out-Turk the Turk in brutal behavior.

Still, I think our State Department ought to take some action in the matter of those missionaries who are reported to have been murdered in Turkey. We have a navy that might be utilized for the purpose of informing the Turk that the treaty rights of American citizens, be they missionaries or other folk, must be respected. There is only one way to compel that respect from the Moslem fanatics. If an American battle fleet would line up before Mersina, or Alexandretta, or Beirut, or Tripoli, as an American fleet once lined up in those same waters for a similar purpose not a hundred years ago; and if the admiral of that fleet should send word to the mayor of the town and the Governor of the vilavet that the place would be bombarded within an hour; and if, in spite of prayer and protest, the admiral should keep his word to the fraction of a minute, and continue to keep in until the city was in ruins, the lesson would be heeded by the most ignorant of the Moslem fanatics, and there would be no more massacres of American citizens as long as memory held sway among the children of this generation. It might be necessary to repeat the dose in thirty or forty years, but in the meantime an American could live in Turkey without fear, and unarmed. It seems to me that this method of "vindicating the national honor" is the only method that should be adopted by a nation that spends millions a year in the maintenance of a navy. The man behind the gun should be encouraged to keep his hand in. Let him practice on the Turk.

The Liar

By Maurice Level

At the top of the cliff, to which I had wandered at eventide, I found an old woman standing very still, her hands joined. The night wind fluttered the ringlets of gray hair about her face. It was a face of infinite sadness. The bells of Brittany were sounding the Angelus as I watched this old woman. Suddenly she stepped forward so close to the edge of the cliff that, in alarm, I seized her sleeve.

"Take care, La Maman! You will fall!"

"Ah! Yes," she murmured.

"You must go home. The wind is rising; it will be cold tonight."

She nodded and then repeated my sentence twice over· "Yes, it will be cold tonight, very cold."

But she did not move. Then only did I see that there were tears in her eyes. I thought I understood and questioned her.

"You are looking for a fishing boat?"

"No, I am looking for nothing. I only look——"

A boat passed, the reflected flame of the sun gilding its sail.

I spoke again. "You love the sea. It is beautiful."

She turned her sad face toward me, but her eyes were hard, her forehead wrinkled into lines of pain, and she murmured:

"No, she is not beautiful, the sea, she is a robber, an assassin!"

Then raising her voice to a note of anger, she went on:

"You people, who live in the city, you are afraid of the women. They are the ones who take your children from you, who steal them. With us, the thief, the prostitute, is She—the sea. Look at her! That is the way she takes our children. We bring them into the world, we nourish them at our breasts, they grow, and then at the very first caress from her they forget everything. To keep them by us we would have them become workmen, farmers. No! They must have Her. They become fishermen. It is in the blood!

"I was born in this village, and since I have been old enough to remember I have seen naught but mourning for the dead.

"First, it was my father. He sailed away one night. It was a beautiful evening; there came up a storm; no one ever saw him again nor the men of the crew. After him, my brothers. Each year the table at home became smaller. One by one they disappeared. The nets dried out there by the door, under the sun and under the wind. The boat rotted at its anchor chain. Then came hunger, gaunt, implacable. We had to go down to the beach, to gather shrimps and crabs. What could we do? We know no other trade. You see, when the men are gone, the women must ask charity of the sea.

"I married and then I thought that bad luck had ceased dogging my footsteps. But She never forgets. One after the other I lost my four sons. My husband alone remained. He—well, he was a sailor, strong, terrible. He had been through it all: the storm, the wreck; and the sea, noting that he always stood erect, looking down upon her, had become afraid of him.

"The last time he went away it was with the cod-catchers, as we call them here—those who fish off the coast of Newfoundland. Over there they fish night and day, in the rain, in the snow, in the wind. And the great waves roll over the boats, carrying away men as if they were feathers. I worried, and when time came for the return I was seized with a sudden fear which I could not explain.

"It was a June morning when they came back, running in with the tide, a splendid sun overhead. My husband was on board of the Jean-Marie, and that boat came in last. Then I knew something was wrong. If my man had been there his boat would have been the first one to cast anchor. When the first persons came ashore, I cried

"'My man! Where is my man?'

"'He is coming; just a little patience,' said a cabin-boy.

"That took the weight from my heart. I had thought—! At last I saw him coming over the deck, leaning upon two of his comrades. Yet he seemed to have his full strength. When he was near I called to him. He stopped, turning his head to the right and to the left.

"'Is it thou, my wife? Where art thou?'

"Oh, that voice! I can hear it now. But what is most distinct is his face, that still face, with the white beard, so white that it seemed a spot upon his sun and wind-tanned skin, and his eyes, those poor eyes without brows or lashes, dead eyes, burned out, finished. The fog, the wind, the water of the sea had reddened them. When he was in my arms he put his trembling hands upon my cheeks and began to cry, saying:

"'I am blind, my dear old wife.'

"You never saw a blind man cry, did you, sir?

"I hoped that with care he might recover his sight. But no, the days, the months passed without any change. He did not go out of the house. All day long he remained seated by the door, listening to the sound of the sea breaking about the rocks. At night, many times he awoke me, saying:

"'I have just been dreaming that I could see.'

"The small sum he had brought home with him was spent, penny by penny, and when the bad season came, we had nothing left. He, usually so thoughtful, seemed to forget the every-day life, and I, not wishing to irritate him, dared say nothing.

"Still, we had to live, so, one by one, I sold every piece of furniture, everything up to the poor old things that had come to me from my grandfather, things you love to look at because they are entwined with so many memories. All went, little by little—all: the sheets, the clothing, the nets, the lines, the boat, which had been anchored out by the quay, and the old clock which marked the hours, a clock I had listened to since I was a little bit of a thing. Now, when it had gone, and I lay awake at night, I tried to remember its voice.

"But he came near finding that out. Once, when he lay awake, he said to me: 'Am I becoming deaf as well as blind? I can't hear the clock any more.'

"'It is broken,' I answered. 'I have sent it to be repaired.'

"'All right,' he replied, and then began to talk about his eyes.

"'If I could only see again,' he said, 'even for an hour, how good it would feel to be able to look about! I remember everything. Here is the cupboard and the dishes; there is the sideboard with the old tin plates; the clock; nets hanging about the walls; and out there in the harbor, the Antoinette, my good old boat, with its great sail and strong oars.'

"I couldn't listen to him without trembling, it hurt me so. I was always on the point of saying:

"'All that doesn't exist any more, dear.'

"But what would have been the good of it! God had taken away the light from him; it was better that he should never know. And latter, he might go away without ever having known, without ever having had the least suspicion."

She stopped and sighed, "Ah, God!"

The Kilkenny Affair

The Sullivan-Phelan imbroglio is very much to be deplored. To one who is inclined to open his heart freely and largely to pity of all that is pitiable, who has deep fraternal charity for the erring, for those who have aspired and fallen, this vulgar family row is most affecting. I know that it has split the sides of the groundlings, I am conscious that words of compassion meant to soothe the tingling ears of a humiliated Phelan will be drowned in the guffaws of the proletariat, but I am constrained nevertheless to express commiseration and to offer my heartfelt sympathy to the stricken publicist. It will not affect my attitude in this matter to be told that there is no man in San Francisco with a greater capacity for relishing spectacles similar to the one in which Mr. Phelan is figuring than that gentleman himself. Nor will it cause me to abate one degree of my compassion to be reminded of Mr. Phelan's inhumanity to scores of his fellow citizens. While it cannot be denied that he has never shown a disposition to curb the most repulsive of the elemental passions that give tone and color to his individuality; while it is generally known that he has inspired much of the venomous personal abuse with which the Boughten Bulletin's columns have reeked in recent years, still such severe retribution as has been visited upon him should afford no gratification to men of generous impulses.

Bitter are the Fruits of Resentment

Mr. Phelan is not the only protagonist of this sordid little drama entitled to compassion. While sincerely deprecating the sensational ebullition of Mr. Sullivan's rage, it is but just to him to say that his passionate unheaval was not without provocation. Earnestly hoping that he may be assuaged before rendering Mr. Phelan more uncomfortable, I will at the same time plead in extenuation of his splenetic outburst that he was the victim of rather harsh, not to say coldblooded, treatment at the hands of the brother-in-law whose political campaigns he managed with wisdom and loyalty. It seems to me but adding insult to injury for Mr. Phelan to say that he did not connive at the removal of Mr. Sullivan from his position in the Mutual Savings Bank. But, aside from this incident, Mr. Sullivan had just cause of complaint. A man of his proud spirit must often have experienced poignant emotion from his consciousness of the treachery that he endured at the hands of the incense burners that have long constituted the Phelan entourage. But his retaliation though slow has all the merit of thoroughness. Cruel were the blows he delivered in his leisurely excursions beyond the confines of the record. With what easy grace he leveled his darts at the joints in the burning moralist's harness! And to think that after years of immunity from the exposure so greatly dreaded it should be wrought by a hand raised out of the bosom of his family. Little does it profit a man for the press to forbear if he provokes the resentment of his sister's husband!

Mr. Hopper of Nowhere

It is rather a curious predicament which our "Jimmie" Hopper has found himself in. He is either a "man without a country," or one with two fatherlands to lay claim to him. In preparing to go abroad, more particularly to France, Mr. Hopper was obliged to take the usual steps to secure a passport for himself, and though he would very much like to consider himself an American he discovered that there is some doubt as to whether he may be French or English, but as to America, he is neither native nor naturalized citizen. Mr. Hopper's father was of Irish birth, and, of course, English political allegiance. He went to France, married a French woman and died there without having renounced his British citizenship. The child was born in that country, but came to America with his mother when he was a small boy and grew up in this country, but, again, the mother never became a naturalized American, and it is a disputed point whether the British citizenship of the father or the French nativity of the mother and son governs the case. It is asserted by some authorities that, never having fulfilled his military duties, the first experience of Hopper when he arrives "home" will be a conscription into the French army, but in the circumstances of the case the law will be complied with in a three-weeks' nominal service. Hopper is not particularly anxious to serve but says if he must he will, and will try to extract material for a book out of the experience. Meanwhile, England has just discovered "9009," and the episode may turn out to be a bit of profitable advertising.

French Citizens Turned Down

In Mayor Taylor there is a perpetual antagonism between the poetry and idealism of his nature and the instincts that were galvanized into life by the touch of public office. This conflict in the unfathomable soul of a man schooled in habits of virtue, the natural impartiality of whose feelings has been warped by an ambition that lifted him out of the monotony of goodness, was illustrated the other day by so simple a matter as the appointment of two supervisors to represent the city government on the occasion of the reception to Ambassador Jusserand who is to pay us a visit on June 5th. Mayor Taylor had been requested by leading French citizens to appoint the two members of the Board who, by reason of their antecedents, are more or less in sympathy with French interests. These two men are A. Comte Jr., the first California graduate of Harvard and Mr. Payot, a gentleman versed in French literature. The fitness of these two gentlemen is so obvious that one might suppose that it was hardly necessary to request their appointment. But in politics one cannot always be guided by consideration of fitness. Mayor Taylor took the request under advisement, and much to the chagrin of the French citizens appointed Mr. Phelan's man, Murphy, and Mr. McKannay's ex-partner, Connolly, to do the honors in the French celebration. Always professing to be uninfluenced by political considerations Mayor Taylor is always persuading the sceptics that the primary election is the perpetual chart by which he takes his course.

MR. TAFT ON THE JOB

Welcomed by a "Potato King"

San Francisco's welcome to the Japanese training ships Aso and Soya was perfunctory and formal. It lacked every element of enthusiasm. It was the proper thing to do and that is all there was to it. The official speeches were as brief as they could be; the shouts were exclusively from the throats of the Japanese residents of the city, and the only interest manifested by the citizens of San Francisco and the neighboring cities was that of curiosity to see the ships that fought against overwhelming and hopeless odds—the Russian cruiser Variag that withstood the concentrated fire of six Japanese warships for nearly an hour, at short range, and went to the bottom of Chemulpo bay unconquered, with her flag still flying and her fighting men still at the guns; and the Russian cruiser Bayan, captured in a running fight during an attempt to escape from Port Arthur while a heavy fog concealed the movement from the blockading fleet. Some amusement, too, was created by the incongruity of circumstance that compelled a rear-admiral of an imperial navy to listen courteously to the welcoming speech of a "Potato King." In Japan a "Potato King" would be classed with the peasantry of the paddy-fields, and no high-bred samurai would submit to his panegyric or his commendation for the "inestimable service he had rendered to the empire." In this instance, however, there was no escape for Admiral Ijichi. The "Potato King" is the richest Japanese in California and a representative subject of the Mikado in a foreign land where the samurai caste distinctions are not recognized. Perhaps, too, the admiral had heard that this "Potato King" is now "one of the leading foreign residents" of Berkeley, highly respected in that eminently respectable community by reason of his great wealth and the obsequious courtesy of his manners. Otherwise than this, however, there is not much interest among San Franciscans over the arrival in our port of this fragment of the Japanese navy. The official fuss was a necessary concomitant of international diplomacy and a proper acknowledgment of the national sense of social obligation to the Japanese for giving our jackies the time of their lives when they were in Yokohama and Tokio on their globe-girdling junket. Nor is our treatment of the Japanese on this occasion exceptionally courteous even in its official or diplomatic aspect; if the warships of Argentine, or Chile or any other country where our sailors and marines were hospitably received, should visit San Francisco, we should give them a hearty welcome and all the encouragement in our power to spend their money like sailors and marines.

A Glimpse of History

The cruiser Aso, flagship of Admiral Ijichi, was the first Russian warship that succumbed to the splendid gunnery of the Japanese. The Russian battleships Cezarevitch and Retvizan were destroyed on the night of February 8, 1904, but the stroke was delivered by the torpedo flotilla—the Russian cruiser Variag was sunk in a naval engagement about noon of the 9th of February, 1904. The Japanese United Squadron, under the general command of Vice-Admiral Togo, left the naval station of Sasebo on February 6th. Arriving in Korean waters, the Japanese captured the Russian steamer Rossia. This was the first act of war, five days before a formal declaration. The squadron then proceeded to a rendezvous, designated in the official dispatches as "a certain place." Here it was ascertained that the majority of the Russian fleet were in the harbor of Port Arthur, and two warships, the cruiser Variag and the gunboat Koreetz, at Chemulpo. The transports, conveying troops for the invasion of Korea, were sent under convoy of six cruisers to Chemulpo, where they arrived on the evening of February 8th. Shortly after their arrival the Japanese gunboat Chiyoda came out of the harbor and reported the feasibility of landing the troops at that port notwithstanding the presence of the two Russian warships. The Koreetz came out of the harbor and fired on the Japanese torpedo flotilla, immediately retiring to the neutral waters of Chemulpo, followed by the Japanese torpedo boats which took up positions around the Russian ships, prepared to blow them up if they made a hostile demonstration against the landing of the troops. In the harbor at this time were the British cruiser Talbot, the United States cruiser Vicksburg, the French cruiser Pascal and the Italian cruiser Elba. On the morning of the 9th, Rear-Admiral Uriu sent an official note to the commander of the Russian squadron requesting him to withdraw from the harbor by one o'clock that afternoon. At the same time he signalled to the foreign warships to change their moorings. This was a clear indication to the commanders of the foreign ships that it was the intention of Admiral Uriu to engage the Russians in the harbor if they would not come out. As the neutrality of Korea had already been violated by the landing of Japanese troops, it would have been a small treachery to engage the Variag and the Koreetz in the harbor. The Japanese at that time were not standing on the usual courtesy. As the foreigners in the harbor would have been injured in the fracas, the Russians went out and soon encountered the overwhelming force of the Japanese. A fierce engagement ensued. A shot from the Japanese ships carried away the mast and destroyed the forebridge of the Variag, killing a score of men. The Koreetz was also badly injured and soon after her magazines exploded and she sank with all on board. The Variag, finding that she was fighting a hopeless fight, attempted to escape under Yuen-tao island where she caught fire and where three of the Japanese ships finished the work they had begun an hour before. The Russian casualties were more than one hundred killed and the remainder wounded more or less severely. The Japanese did not lose a man, and none of their ships was seriously injured. Three days later the Japanese government declared war on Russia. This brief resume of the first acts of hostility by Japan against Russia is offered here as a sample of the Japanese way of beginning war. It is not exactly according to the Hoyle of war, but it is quite effective, and it may be regarded as a forewarning by anyone who may feel himself concerned as to what will happen in the event of similar complications with the "honorable" Japanese, whose "bushido" or knightly courtesy is for home practice and is not a commodity for export beyond the three-mile limit that marks the marine boundary of the empire.

Futility of Some Preaching

Dr. Charles Aked of the Fifth Avenue Church, New York, where John D. Rockefeller tries to realize that he cannot serve two masters, wasted his breath last Sunday in denunciation of women of the world who do not live up to the religion of motherhood. "These women," thundered this Boanerges, "are married, but they are not wives; they have children, but they are not mothers; they live in expensive houses with costly surroundings, but they do not respect the sacredness of home." Just so; and it has been so since Abraham, at the behest of Sarah, turned Hagar into the wilderness with the infant Ishmael. It will probably be so until the sun grows cold and the stars grow old. There are two good reasons, therefore, why Dr. Aked and his fellow preachers should devote their attention to more profitable subjects of discourse. In the first place, their preaching, as Dr. Aked admits, is futile; and, in the second place, the women whom they denounce are but an insignificant proportion of the womanhood of the world. Where there is one woman that forgets her duty as a wife and a mother, there are ten thousand in whom the instinct of motherhood and wifehood is as strong as it was when the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair, and took them wives of all which they choose. I suspect, however, that Dr. Aked preached on this theme because it is a perfectly safe one in a church where John D. Rockefeller is the chief pillar.

The Sweetest Story Ever Written

It was my fortune, once upon a time, to hear John Fox, Jr., suggest to Richard Harding Davis that he write a serious story on the subject of the mother-in-law.

"You are not serious yourself, John," said the author of Soldiers of Fortune.

"Yes, I am," insisted the author of the Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come; "and I will supply you with the ingredients of your story. It must contain pathos, poetry, devotion, sacrifice and all the elements that go to the making of a perfect love story."

"Impossible," declared the Great Journalist, "a story about the mother-in-law is a humorous story; it is in the George Ade and O. Henry class."

"Guess again, Dickie," laughed Fox. "The sweetest story ever written—I was going to call it the greatest story ever written—was about a mother-in-law. It was written, however, by a master." The sarcasm was lost on the special correspondent.

"Tell me the name of this best seller," he urged.

"I didn't say it was a best seller," rejoined the Kentuckian, "but it is in a book that is more widely distributed, if less widely read, than all the best sellers ever printed. I am thinking of the Book of Ruth in the Bible, Dickie."

For an instant the author of the Bar Sinister was crushed to earth, but he rose again and tried to convince Fox that the mother-in-law of Ruth was not the story. "If you had asked me to write a story about a daughter-in-law," he argued, "I would have grasped the possibilities."

"And if I had mentioned the daughter-in-law, the joke wouldn't have been on wise little Dickie Davis," responded Fox with a laugh that was gladly echoed by the rest of us, not so much in approval of the jest as in derision of Davis, whose egotism is a thing of beauty and a joy forever in the eyes of those who do not like him.

A Remarkable Resurrection

The New York Telegraph solemnly informs us that "a literary resurrection that should prove of unquestioned interest to many persons has been made in London within a few months. The thing resurrected is the "hitherto unknown manuscript of a prose poem by Oscar Wilde entitled 'The Happy Prince.'" It has received a musical setting and was recited by Kitty Cheatham at an Easter festival in New York. It must indeed be surprising to many persons to learn of the resurrection of this prose poem, for there are many persons who never heard of its having been buried. "The Happy Prince" is one of the best known of Wilde's exquisite prose poems. It was published in Town Talk within a year after Oscar Wilde's death. It is to be found in all editions of that great poet's works.

atory trusts. Kermit, who is as yet only a Prince of Hunters and heir apparent to his Father's fame, killed one monarch of the jungle. It was a great day in Africa, and those four shots were heard round the world. This week the King of Hunters and the Prince have been shooting giraffes. The giraffe is a mollycoddle of beasts and the hunters hunt him to kill him only because he is a rare specimen and necessary as obvious proof that this is a "scientific expedition" as well as a slaughterfest. The nimble-footed hartbest and the agile-limbed sprinbok are also being gathered to the bag of the scientist for ultishipment to the Smithsonian Institute. It is not so related, but the inference is plain, that the Mighty Hunter experienced great difficulty in stalking those lions. The up-to-date king of beasts is a timid cat, and unless the "beaters" are numerous, active and alert, he sneaks through the cordon and beats it for the great beyond with persistent and irrepressible alacrity. It is necessary to fool his majesty, by "beating" him in the direction of the hunter, who lies in wait until he goes by on his wild career, and pots him on the jump. Everything depends on the marksmanship of the hunter of lions. If he misses the bounding beast it is all off. He is swift of foot and a horse cannot compete with him for speed. His roar is worse than his bite, for he roars at long range and seldom approaches close enough to bite anybody. Those lions that were killed by our Hunter probably never knew what hit them. Their going out was painless like modern dentistry, and their death was instantaneous, like a snap-shot camera. We are told that this Famous Lion Hunt was on the ranch of Sir Alfred Pease, a breeding-farm for lions which are sold on the hoof to the menageries of the world, the purchasers to trap their own beasts. The ranch is surrounded by a high barbed-wire fence to prevent the escape of the lions after they have been disturbed by the "beaters." Everything was ready for the Mighty Hunter on his arrival at the Pease ranch, and half a dozen of the biggest and most active lions had been selected as targets for the Hunter. It is extremely gratifying to hear that the programme was successfully carried out. The skeletons of the king of beasts killed by the King of Hunters will be articulated and mounted and sent to the Smithsonian Institute where they will be catalogued as "Leo rooseveltiensis." The skins will be processed by the taxidermist's art and converted into hearth rugs and doormats.

George Harris Donohue, "the original mysterious Mr. Raffles," is in town assisting the circulation of The Chronicle by offering himself for "capture." Anyone who says to him, "You are the mysterious Mr. Raffles," will receive a reward of $500. The device is an old one, Mr. Donohue having practiced in Chicago as long ago as ten years, and his imitators have infested nearly all the big cities of the nation. There is a feature, however, in this latest trick of the newspaper trade that will commend it to the interest of this community. Mr. Donohue boasts that he has "never been caught." He has outwitted the shrewdest detectives in the country and he now proposes to test the perspicacity of that famous sleuth, William J. Burns. He will converse with the great detective on some absurd theme and the great detective will not be sure that he is face to face with "the mysterious Mr. Raffles," for a sleuth as shrewd as William J.
